You may have a copy of this Guide because someone close to you has received a diagnosis of dementia. It may be that you have strong feelings that a close relative or friend is starting to demonstrate symptoms of the condition which are affecting their daily life. Whether dementia has been a part of your life for some time or is something relatively new, you are likely to be looking for information.

Whatever your situation, this Guide offers practical information for people living with dementia and those supporting someone with dementia. You may be a relative, a friend, a member of the community, whatever your role in the person with dementia’s life, this Guide should help inform you about dementia and living with the condition on a daily basis.

To remain consistent, throughout this Guide we will be referring to 'you' as the person supporting someone with dementia. This is not intended to exclude those living with dementia, the person with dementia should always be at the centre of everything.

Introduction

According to Alzheimer’s Society, around 225,000 people will develop dementia each year, that’s one every three minutes. Dementia is a progressive illness. It affects the brain and its symptoms can vary from person to person. No two people experience dementia in the same way.

“Don’t wait too long to get help. Press for diagnosis, which is key to getting services. Knowledge itself can help you to cope, accept what’s happening, and plan for the future. Use the internet and social media to gain information and support from peers.”
DIAGNOSIS

When it comes to a dementia diagnosis, whether it is expected or comes completely out of the blue, it is likely to have a significant impact on the person receiving the diagnosis and those around them. Each person will be different and there is no doubt that there are considerations to be made along the way. Some may even decide they don’t want to pursue a diagnosis.

Early diagnosis can be considered important. It may be to key to receiving information and/or support. However, there are many factors that can affect if, or when, a person receives any diagnosis of dementia.

COMMUNICATION

It is unrealistic to think that everybody will come to this publication at the same stage. Although it is hard to come to terms with, the symptoms of dementia will increase over time. By directing the information in this Guide to you, as a family member or close friend, but keeping the person with dementia at the heart of the conversation, we hope to reach everybody.

Communication can feel hard, conversations can be difficult, and people don’t always want to open up. This means that people can delay having important conversations about the future. The aim of this Guide is to support and inform you and your family to talk about important matters when you are all ready, whether that’s now or in the future.

It is important to try to talk as much as possible and keep the lines of communication open, with the person with dementia, family members and professionals. By doing this, it is more likely that you will find answers to the questions that you have and ways to manage the ongoing changes that dementia symptoms bring. Repeat appointments with professionals can also allow you all to ask any questions that may arise over time.

SERVICES

Accessing services and support can make a huge difference to people with dementia and their families. In many places, a dementia diagnosis is the starting point for accessing services and support. However, it doesn’t have to be, and this Guide has comprehensive lists of local services starting on page 65.

PLANNING

It is important to recognise that a diagnosis of dementia does not necessarily mean that an individual can no longer make decisions about their future. People can live well with dementia for a long time. By leading the decision-making process in any way possible, for as long as they are able, it can help their day-to-day life to take shape in the way they want it to and create a positive plan for their future.

Planning for the future, including the use of life stories, lasting powers of attorney and advanced decisions, often brings reassurance to people who are worried that they may not be able to make such important decisions in the future. It also guarantees that you are not put under the additional pressure of making a decision on behalf of your loved one and worrying that it may go against what they would have wanted for themselves.

Remembering that a person with dementia is, first and foremost, an individual with their own unique life experiences, personality and likes and dislikes, is one of the most important aspects of supporting them and planning for the future. This will also shape how the person with dementia would prefer to be cared for as their needs increase, including their end of life and funeral wishes.

CARE AND SUPPORT

This sentiment is echoed in national strategies for dementia, which aim to ensure that people who deliver adult social care services fully understand and meet the needs of the person with dementia and their family. This includes person-centred planning, gathering and recording information and using life stories, along with an ethos centred on really getting to know the person with dementia. This enables them to deliver relationship-centred care as relationships are a huge part of life and who we are as individuals.

There is also a drive to raise awareness of dementia amongst the wider public, in communities and public services, as well as raising standards and increasing public awareness of excellent dementia care. Raising public awareness starts with each one of us.

LIVING WELL WITH DEMENTIA

This Guide will support you, and the person living with dementia, from diagnosis and daily living, onto care and support through to plans for end of life care. We will also discuss the legal and financial considerations that come with a dementia diagnosis. The resources and information available are vast, and for that reason we are aware that this publication can only take you so far.

Other useful publications and sources start on page 74. We have also included further links to websites, videos and blogs, where people share their experiences to help you and the person you support.

Finally, we know that you’re not alone in supporting someone with dementia. That is why throughout this Guide, we have included real-life examples and stories from people who support someone with dementia. These might be family carers, dedicated dementia nurses or trained care and support staff. Consider that the information you gather and experiences you have whilst supporting someone with dementia could help someone else. Over time, if you feel able to, consider passing your knowledge forward and sharing your experiences with others.

People live well with dementia for a long time, we hope this Guide offers you the information to support the person in your life to live well with dementia.
What is dementia?

You may be supporting someone living with a formal diagnosis of dementia, or you may be finding changes in someone’s ability to recall recent or long-term memory which is affecting their daily life. Whatever your situation, there can be a lot of myths around dementia.

"I found it helped to read up on my Dad’s dementia. It was hard to start with, and frankly quite daunting, but the more I read, the more I realised that everyone’s dementia symptoms are different. Of course, some people had difficult stories to share, but it’s the same with everything, everyone had a different experience and I prefer to be informed."

If you think that someone may have dementia, or you or someone close to you has just received a diagnosis of dementia, you are likely to want to know more information. In modern times, it’s natural to head to the internet and search ‘dementia’. You are likely to find a wide variety of information, covering many different types of dementia. You may find it difficult to sort through everything, you may be overwhelmed by other people’s experiences of dementia and its symptoms. If you want to know more about dementia, it’s important to look for quality information, and filter through what you read.

Organisations like Alzheimer’s Society or Alzheimer’s Research UK have a lot of useful publications that can help to inform you. They are written by experts but in an easy-to-digest way. If you’re going to start anywhere, this is as good a place as any.

This publication intends to give you an overview of dementia, living with the symptoms of the condition and planning for the future. We’re starting with some common examples of dementia and their symptoms, though it’s important to consider that no one person experiences dementia in the same way, the symptoms are different in all people.

Dementia is the name given to describe a variety of conditions, all of which can cause the brain to deteriorate. Many people live well for a long time and have a good memory, although some people may notice memory changes over time. It should be said that the ageing process can put someone at higher risk of developing certain types of dementia, however, dementia is not a normal part of getting older. Also, it doesn’t just affect older people. Whilst dementia is more prevalent in people over 65, it can develop at a younger age.

COMMON TYPES OF DEMENTIA

According to Alzheimer’s Society, there are many different types of dementia, some are very rare, and little is known about them, but some are much more common.

As mentioned above, each type of dementia can be very different, and people can experience different symptoms. Dementia looks different in all people. It is a progressive condition that affects the brain. As a result, this can affect the personality, ability to communicate and, ultimately, the physical and mental abilities of the person with the condition.

Alzheimer’s disease

This is the most common form of dementia and the one you may have heard most about. Alzheimer’s disease develops ‘plaques’ and ‘tangles’ in the brain, as well as depleting the brain of certain chemicals. These physically change the brain and its ability to send and receive signals. As the disease progresses, the chemistry and structure of the brain change. This leads to the deterioration of brain cells and an inability to access what was held by those cells.

Although Alzheimer’s disease can affect people differently, there are common examples of symptoms. Although, again, symptoms can be different in different people. Someone with a diagnosis of Alzheimer’s disease may become confused or disorientated. The person may struggle to recall a recent memory or people's names. Alzheimer’s disease can also affect the person’s mood and may make them angry, upset or frustrated. As the dementia symptoms progress, they can have an impact on the person’s ability to communicate. This has been known to lead to people becoming withdrawn or depressed.

Vascular dementia

Vascular dementia is caused when the brain’s blood supply is interrupted. The symptoms of vascular dementia can occur suddenly, following a stroke, or over time through a series of smaller strokes or small vessel disease. Not everyone who has had a stroke will go on to develop this type of dementia, but those who have are more at risk.

As with Alzheimer’s disease, vascular dementia’s symptoms can develop in different ways in different people. However, commonly experienced symptoms can affect a person’s concentration, cause confusion or even seizures. Issues with memory aren’t always the first symptom of vascular dementia.

Dementia with Lewy bodies

Lewy bodies are small, circular lumps of protein that develop inside brain cells. It is not known what causes them. It is also unclear how they affect the brain and eventually cause dementia symptoms. However, their presence is linked to low levels of important chemical messengers and a loss of connections between nerve cells.

This form of dementia progresses in a similar way to Parkinson’s disease, where people may have similar symptoms, such as muscle rigidity, involuntary shaking and slow movement. Dementia with Lewy bodies may affect memory, but people may also have symptoms including disturbed sleep, issues with attention span or spatial awareness.

Dementia with Lewy Bodies can occur alongside Alzheimer’s disease or vascular dementia.

Fronto-temporal dementia
This type of dementia is one of the less common forms. It is caused by damage and shrinking in specific areas of the brain that control behaviour, emotions and language. It may also be called Pick’s disease. When nerve cells in these parts of the brain die off, the pathways that connect them change and, over time, the brain tissue shrinks.

This form of dementia is more likely to affect people under the age of 65.

By its nature, people with this type of dementia are likely to experience personality changes. Some symptoms may include unusual behaviour such as aggression or being distracted. People may also develop difficulty with their speech, or experience changes in their ability to hold conversations and/or find the right words.

RARER TYPES OF DEMENTIA

There are many other types of dementia that are much rarer than those mentioned above. Alzheimer’s Society has a good explanation of all forms of dementia, including those which are less common, plus details of where to go for help.

Useful sources begin on page 74.

NEXT STEPS

If your loved one has received a formal diagnosis (discussed more in the next chapter), you may have a name for their type of dementia. This may be the time that you consider searching the internet for more information. Whatever information you find, a diagnosis doesn’t mean that the person will have ‘textbook’ symptoms, or that the dementia symptoms progress in a common way.

Seeking a diagnosis can be the key to accessing services and support. However, a person has a choice over whether or not to seek a diagnosis. They may not be aware of any symptoms or have insight into what you consider may be dementia symptoms. This is why it is important to speak to the person and focus on their thoughts, wishes and considerations.

Whether or not the person with dementia has received a formal diagnosis or wants to consider diagnosis now or in the future, there are a number of national and local organisations that can offer support.

The local organisations starting on page 65 will give you more information on what’s available locally. National organisations and other sources start on page 74.
Is it dementia? Symptoms and diagnosis

Many people live well for a long time and have good memory; however, it isn’t unusual to notice some memory changes over time. It can be difficult to tell whether memory changes are actually a symptom of dementia or just what some like to call ‘senior moments’.

At some point in their lives, most people have forgotten an appointment, lost their keys or had trouble putting a name to a face. However, if these occasions are becoming more frequent, or it is becoming increasingly difficult to recall certain things, they may be symptoms of an underlying condition, particularly if other changes are happening at the same time.

According to Alzheimer’s Society, people with dementia experience the symptoms of the condition in different ways. However, common symptoms can include:

- Memory lapses, such as struggling to remember recent events.
- Difficulty taking in new information.
- Losing the track of conversations or TV programmes.
- Being unable to remember names, people or items.

Arrange a follow up appointment to cover social services, intervention therapies, and face to face peer support for both the person diagnosed with dementia and their carer.
• Changes in ability to reason or make decisions.
• Changes in personality or behaviour, including becoming angry, frustrated or upset at memory issues.
• Being disorientated in time or place, including changes to spatial awareness.

If you are concerned that someone may be demonstrating the symptoms of dementia, try to keep a note of things that are changing. As mentioned previously, dementia symptoms can be different in different people. It’s not always forgetfulness, it may be changes in their personality, a spatial awareness issue, confusion or even being unable to find the right words. This is why jotting down your concerns can help you to see if there is a pattern, or whether they may suggest specific dementia symptoms. Having this information may help you if you want to search online. It may also form the starting point for any conversations with the person demonstrating the symptoms or to give examples to the GP.

People have differing opinions about getting a dementia diagnosis. Some people are keen to have answers, whereas others feel it may become a label. People have a choice over whether to seek a diagnosis now, in the future or not at all.

Whatever your thoughts, and the thoughts of the person who may have dementia, a formal diagnosis can be the key to accessing professionals, services, support and, where appropriate, treatment if that is what the person wishes.

UNDERSTANDING CHANGES

If someone begins to recognise symptoms that could be related to dementia, the first port of call should be the GP. If it is you that has noticed changes in another person, approach the matter sensitively with them and try to understand their perspective. They may not be aware of any changes, or they may not want to act on anything. You don’t want to create a situation where they feel under pressure to see a doctor if they’re not ready or don’t want to.

In these situations, approach the subject in different ways. Keeping a note and showing them the symptoms or signs written down may be effective. As may a frank or sensitive conversation about your worries. Approach the situation as you would any delicate subject; your intimate knowledge of the person demonstrating dementia symptoms will help with this. Don’t be afraid to share your thoughts with a close family friend or relative who may also know the person well. They may be able to help you come up with ways to broach the subject or may have noticed symptoms too.

Dementia is not spoken about as much as it should be. Many people don’t have conversations early enough. However, if the person demonstrating the dementia symptoms is open to it, it’s important to seek assistance from a medical professional as early on as possible. Early diagnosis is the key to any available treatment, support or services and to enable planning for the future. However, that said, it is not always easy to diagnose in early stages.

When visiting the doctor, respect your relative’s privacy. If they don’t want you to go along to the appointment, respect that.

You may be able to put down in writing the symptoms that you have noticed, which they can take along, or you may be able to call, write to or email the doctor in advance.

MEDICAL EXPERTISE

There are some medical conditions that can mimic dementia-like symptoms. A doctor would be able to rule out anything else. The GP may undertake blood and urine tests to check whether there is an underlying cause.

There is no single test for diagnosing dementia, but the doctor is likely to ask the person demonstrating dementia symptoms about themselves, talking to you as well if you’re at the appointment. This is where any symptoms you have written down can help the doctor to build a bigger picture.

The doctor will also look at your relative’s medical history and review any existing conditions or medications. This will help them to identify whether there are other causes that need managing or treating first. The GP may also offer a simple ‘pen and paper’ test for the person to complete while they’re there.

In some cases, the GP may be able to diagnose dementia at this point – especially where symptoms may already be quite advanced. However, they may want to refer on for further tests, or wait until they have the results of any medical tests.

Referrals from the GP may be onto community mental health teams, made up of a number of different specialists, or onto a memory clinic or a memory service – they will be called different things in different areas. These specialist services may undertake more in-depth memory tests to diagnose dementia or be able to signpost to further information and services.

The memory service is designed to give a diagnosis, however, follow up appointments and further assessments may be needed. The person with dementia should be fully involved, and informed, at every stage and the GP should also receive details of the assessments and any diagnosis.

The NHS Choices website has a good summary of the types of dementia tests that may be offered in order to receive a diagnosis, visit www.nhs.co.uk

Research by Alzheimer’s Society has found that doctors can be reluctant to diagnose dementia because of a lack of support from NHS and social care services. If you feel this is the case, speak to the GP openly and ask for a second opinion, if you feel it necessary.

Services across England to support people living with dementia, their family and carers are many and varied. They may be health, social care, primary care or community services.

In some areas, these different organisations may work well together. However, in other areas they may not be as joined-up.

In these cases, you and the person living with dementia may find yourselves answering the same questions, giving the same information and having to make contact with different services and departments. It can be frustrating.

As the level of formal services varies across the country, there is an increasing number of local voluntary services which can offer different types of support.

The local contacts starting on page 65 could help you to find services nearby.

DIAGNOSIS

If, or when, a diagnosis of dementia is made, any treatments that are available will be discussed with you and the person with dementia. Any treatments will vary depending on the type of dementia the person has been diagnosed with, and how far the symptoms have progressed.

If the dementia is caused by an underlying medical condition, treating the condition may help. For others, there may be medication available, although this is not always the case and depends on a number of factors.

Dementia is a progressive illness and, although there are treatments, there is no cure. If someone has been diagnosed with dementia, they may be offered medication to help slow the progress of symptoms, depending on the stage and type of dementia. However, medication may not be offered to everyone, as it may not be effective in their specific circumstances.

The NHS Choices website sets out different treatments for dementia. Speak to a medical professional about what may be available for your relative because unfortunately, there may not be a suitable treatment.

At the point of diagnosis, you and the person with dementia should be given information and advice on local services and support groups, details of any benefits that may be available and techniques to help manage symptoms.

Details of local support services start on page 65. Information on benefits is on page 38 and the chapter on living with dementia starts on page 25.

“What was important to me was to ask my GP what type of dementia my mother had and how it would progress.”

The person with dementia should be fully involved, and informed, at every stage.
AFTER DIAGNOSIS

Receiving a diagnosis can be a shock for some people. For others, it can help them to finally have answers to symptoms that they have been experiencing. It is important that everyone takes the time to process the news.

As with any diagnosis, you, the person with dementia and their wider family and friends may react in different ways. This is completely natural, and people may need time to process the news.

There should be support available to help at this time and into the future. Take a look at the local services starting on page 65.

Some people can feel left on their own after a diagnosis of dementia. This should not happen, but knowing what services are available in the local area, and making contact with them, can offer support and advice when you need it.

Also, look to set up a good support network of family, friends or people in the wider community, such as neighbours, religious or cultural groups or local support organisations.

It may be important to you or the person diagnosed to discuss the diagnosis with your local faith leader, for example your local vicar, rabbi or imam, to see what support they might be able to offer, both practically and spiritually.

If you are not offered any follow-up appointments with medical professionals, seek advice from local organisations as to what may be available in your area.

See page 65 for information on local services.

Look to see if there are any ‘Dementia Friends’ sessions in the area if you want to know more about dementia and how to support someone with dementia. Also, more areas are becoming ‘Dementia Friendly’ where individuals, shops and other organisations undertake dementia training to support people with dementia in their community.

Some people may find it rewarding to participate in research studies if they have received a diagnosis of dementia. Join Dementia Research is a website designed to match people who want to be a part of dementia research with studies that would suit them, from questionnaires through to drug trials.

Visit www.joindementiaresearch.nihr.ac.uk to find out more about what’s involved.

Dementia is a progressive condition; this means it is important to think about the future and make plans with the person with dementia, while they are able to share their wishes. This is discussed in more detail in the following chapters, but it is important to note that planning for the future is easier the sooner it is started.
Most people will automatically consider planning for legal and financial considerations – wills, financial affairs, powers of attorney. However, just as important is considering the person with dementia’s life history, who they are and what makes them the person they are. This could involve putting together scrapbooks of photographs and stories, anecdotes, details of childhood and adult friends, favourite pets, enjoyable games and hobbies – this information will become invaluable as the dementia symptoms progress.

Whether the person with dementia is a partner, parent, sibling or close friend, whatever your relationship, you are unlikely to know everything about their life. Alzheimer’s Society recommends that people make a life history book, however, it doesn’t have to be a book, it could be a memory box, photo album, digital presentation or video – the choice of format is entirely up to you and your loved one.

My husband has chosen a nursing home, so that will negate any guilt on my part if the time comes for placement. Or if I become incapacitated.
Wherever possible, draw on the input of others whilst putting together this life story record. People can find this aspect of reminiscing and planning very helpful and therapeutic, helping them to share stories, connect and enjoy their time learning about each other. Also, different people have different perspectives, stories and insights, which can really enhance the reminiscence and be useful in the future. Not only will everyone enjoy the time spent sharing stories, you will have a lovely keepsake to refer to and which can also be passed onto future generations.

It is also valuable to help support the person with dementia as their symptoms progress. As the condition develops, understanding their life history can help to fill in aspects of what they may be experiencing or trying to communicate. As short-term memories can fade, longer term ones can remain, so having the life story to refer back to, look through together, or inform is really helpful.

Practically, it can be a useful resource for sharing time together and may bring comfort to all. The information can be condensed for medical professionals and shared with any care or support staff. This will help everyone who may support the person with dementia to gain a good understanding of them as an individual and what makes them who they are.

It will help to build up a picture of their personality, likes and dislikes, routines and how they like to live their life. This can then be central to any personalised care and support plans.

“We had a storybook photo album of Mum’s life. She loved it and the staff at the care home loved it, too.”

WHAT GOES INTO A LIFE STORY RECORD?

A life story record is a unique collection of information, memories and anecdotes about the person with dementia. It could cover all manner of things. However, it is a good idea to start talking with the person about their early life and significant events. Try to keep all conversations positive, but if there are any particularly significant negative life events, record these elsewhere for future reference – but not necessarily as part of the main record.

The following categories are designed to be conversation prompts. Not all need to be discussed, and if the person with dementia isn’t able to recall some or all of them, that’s fine, just concentrate on what they’re able to share and consider coming back to things at another time.

- Place of birth.
- Childhood town.
- Family – parents, siblings, other close relations – names, occupations, interests.
- Childhood friends.
- Pets.
• School life.
• Childhood interests – hobbies, favourite holidays etc.
• Occupations.
• Meeting their partner.
• Getting married.
• Having children.
• Family holidays.
• Significant family memories.

These topics are great to open conversations. From here, you can consider looking through old photos to give context to specific events or memories. Your relative may have special items or possessions that also help to build the picture or stimulate conversations. Try to bring these into the conversation and make a note of the story behind them.

Don’t forget the benefits of involving other people in this process for different perspectives, stories or anecdotes.

If compiling a book or folder, you can stick in or add the photographs and write the anecdotes or stories alongside. The items could go into a memory box, or you could take a photo of them to put into the book for future reference, or to keep the connection between the item and the story.

Alzheimer’s Society’s Remembering together – making a life history book, leaflet has a useful suggestion for when there may not be photos or items available. It recommends, ‘Photographs and documents may have been lost over time. ‘Think creatively about finding things to use, such as a recent map showing a place of birth or a modern photo of a school attended. It may be possible to find old photographs and postcards at antique fairs, second-hand book and charity shops or online.’ Also, if there is a historical society close to where the person with dementia grew up, they may be able to help.

From this point, you can go on to explore the person with dementia’s likes and dislikes, daily routines or habits. Consider the following as a starting point:
• How do they like to be dressed?
• How do they have their hair?
• How do they have their facial hair?
• What do they like to do in the morning?
• What are their favourite meals?
• What foods don’t they like?
• Do they listen to the radio or watch TV?
• What’s their favourite type of music, programme or song?
• How do they take their tea?
• Do they attend church?
• Do they enjoy gardening?
• Do they enjoy animals? Have any pets?

As the person’s dementia symptoms progress, these specifics will assist anyone who may support them in daily life. It will enable people to build a clear understanding of who the person is and what is important to them.

CARE AND SUPPORT PLANNING

The care and support chapter starting on page 45 covers what types of services may be available. However, when engaging with formal care services, planning is, again, essential. You may want to discuss thoughts and wishes around care and support. Does the person with dementia want to be supported at home for as long as possible? Would they prefer to be supported in a care home or care home with nursing when their needs reach the level that requires care home support? Conversations around care and support can be difficult, people can have mixed feelings about care homes. As such, planning in advance and discussing care and support options can make decisions easier in the future.

When choosing social care support, any service provider, or the local authority, if it is involved, will undertake an assessment of the person with dementia, looking at any care and support needs they may have. How these needs will be best met should be set out in a care and support plan and could include formal services, or outside activities such as day services or voluntary organisations.

Social services are an invaluable resource and aren’t going to take the person with dementia away.

As part of the assessment and planning process, other professionals involved the person’s life should be consulted to build a picture of their care and support needs. If you’d like to know more about specific care and support that is available, the Care Choices website could help. It has a wealth of information for people seeking care and support as well as details of local care providers. Visit www.carechoices.co.uk

Once the person’s needs have been assessed and any suitable services have been recommended or engaged, their life story details and personal information will come into their own.

As the symptoms progress, it can become difficult for people with dementia to communicate what they may be experiencing. A good knowledge of their life history and their likes and dislikes can help anyone supporting them to understand what they may be communicating or experiencing. For example, if someone becomes upset at breakfast time and doesn’t want to eat, consider what you’ve offered them, do they like it? Have you made them coffee when they only drink tea? Do you have Radio 2 on, when they prefer Radio 4? Any of these could have unsettled the person with dementia.

This is why understanding more about who they are can help everyone to understand what they are trying to communicate. This is useful information for any family members, friends and care or support workers – so keep a copy of their life story record in easy reach for consultation, but also as a lovely activity to look through regularly.

LIFE STORIES IN CARE SETTINGS

Knowing about a person’s life story is very important to care teams. It enables them to provide person-centred care and helps them to have insight into any particular actions or behaviours a person may have that are sometimes difficult to understand.

‘A gentleman could not be persuaded to shower. However, when the care team became aware that his wife always used to lay out his clean clothes for him before running his shower, they did the same and it gave him the opportunity to do as much of his own personal care as he could.’

‘A lady would become very unsettled after teatime. Using her life story, the care team found out that she used to work in a pub in the evenings. Once they knew this, they started to invite her to gather up the plates and glasses after teatime and then do the washing up.

‘This fitted with what she had done for years. It helped her to become more settled, perhaps feeling that she had achieved her goal.’

OTHER FORMS OF PLANNING

As mentioned at the beginning of this chapter, planning for the future is important. There are specific financial, legal and end of life plans that need to be made. As a person’s dementia symptoms progress, they are likely to lose the capacity to make specific, important decisions. That is why these plans need to be in place.

The chapter on financial and legal planning explains more on page 59. Making plans for end of life including funeral wishes are covered in more detail on page 54.

IS IT TOO LATE TO PLAN?

In an ideal world, everyone would receive an early diagnosis of dementia, enabling them to plan for the future and set out everything they wish.

However, it is quite likely that the formal diagnosis has come later, if at all, and the person’s dementia symptoms have progressed to a point where they aren’t able to communicate all of these things as you, or they, would like.

This doesn’t mean you can’t plan at all. People experience the symptoms of dementia in different ways, at different times. There may be moments when the person is able to recall specific events or stories. At these times, the use of photographs can help to prompt them. As can involving friends or family members, as they may have a story or event to share.

Alternatively, playing their favourite music may help or singing a favourite song. Looking over and handling cherished items can be useful, as can smells such as a favourite perfume or aftershave, meal or flower.

Putting plans in place will help to ensure that everyone around the person with dementia will know their likes, dislikes, preferences, life history and wishes for the future.

This can be an emotional process and may take time to complete. However, when important decisions need to be made in the future, it will help that you’ve had the opportunity to make these plans, in whatever way has been possible for you.

If someone’s capacity to make decisions over their legal, financial and healthcare affairs changes significantly, the chapter on page 59 covers the available options in more detail.
When a family member has dementia

It’s true to say that a diagnosis of dementia isn’t just given to the person with dementia, but to their wider family, friends, neighbours and social networks. If the person who is diagnosed with dementia is still working, that also means sharing that diagnosis with their manager and work colleagues.

The way in which you, as one of the people around someone with dementia, experience that person’s dementia, is always going to be different to the experiences of the diagnosed person. Depending on individual outlooks, a person diagnosed with dementia may learn to live with their symptoms and adapt to their changed life. Other people living with dementia may go into denial, or even shut off from the world around them.

As the symptoms of dementia progress, it can be common for a person with dementia to not be aware of this, or not fully absorb the effect that their symptoms are having on themselves or those around them.

CHANGES TO RELATIONSHIPS

Alongside the different emotions being felt by the person with dementia, and those closest to them, you may find that family dynamics change.

“Don’t expect too much of yourself. Try to recognise which jobs have to be done by you and which can be done by someone else, allowing you to be wife/son/husband/daughter – which is your most valuable role.”
They may become strained or redefined over time.

Whenever a person you care about develops dementia symptoms, there is inevitably going to be an adjustment to this new reality. If the person with dementia used to take charge of certain regular tasks for themselves and/or others, such as cooking, cleaning, shopping, gardening, working, running household finances or caring for other family members, any difficulties they experience with completing these tasks are going to impact upon their life, and yours.

“We found that education as to what dementia entails was really important. We learnt that we must help to manage the condition, not the person. That the person with the diagnosis of dementia is the same person after diagnosis as they were before diagnosis. Their symptoms do not immediately become severe just because of a diagnosis of dementia. There are beginning and middle stages long before later stages.”

It is important to remember that for most people with dementia, changes are gradual. A lot of people live well with dementia for a long time. Gradual changes allow for small adjustments to be made to life and routines, as the weeks, months and years pass. As such, a diagnosis, if received, doesn’t mean that life in its current form has to change overnight. However, it is helpful to be prepared for the changes that may come along.

For family and friends, and particularly if you accept the very personal and intimate role as a carer, the changes that dementia brings can often be experienced in very painful and emotional terms.

Common emotions can include denial, fear, a sense of loss and, as the person’s dementia symptoms progress, guilt if their needs get to a point where you can no longer care for them as you would wish to.

This is where the role of Admiral Nurses (specialist dementia nurses) really comes to the fore. Admiral Nurses support the whole family, and many carers report that the support of an Admiral Nurse was an absolute lifeline, helping to prevent carer breakdown. Sadly, Admiral Nursing services aren’t available across the whole of England.

“Find out if you have a local Admiral Nursing team on the Dementia UK website, www.dementiauk.org

Even if you don’t have a local service that can provide face-to-face support, Admiral Nursing Direct is a national telephone helpline staffed by Admiral Nurses. It can be accessed by anyone looking for support and advice relating to dementia.

The Helpline is 0845 257 9406 or email direct@dementiauk.org

There are top tips from an Admiral Nurse on page 36.

The chapter starting on page 37 looks at carers, their rights, needs and support. However, it is worth mentioning now that if you are a carer, you need to look after yourself to enable you to look after the person with dementia. Consider contacting the local authority for an assessment of your needs; you have a right to have your needs assessed and you may be eligible for support. Also explore any benefits like carer’s allowance. Local support organisations may be able to help you apply for benefits.

“Do not be dragged down by the negative stories out there. Be aware of the likelihood that things could become very difficult, but until they do, enjoy life! Change your mind to the situation. Don’t let your mind make it bad before it is.”
PARTNERS

Alongside aspects of daily living, and changing abilities to complete certain regular tasks, family relationships can also change. If you are the partner of a person with dementia, and perhaps together you had made plans for the future, it’s natural to feel a certain sense of loss that these plans may never be able to come to fruition. These feelings can be even more acute if the person with dementia has been diagnosed when they are younger (under 65).

Donald had held a high-profile job in the city of London when he was offered early retirement. He and his wife, Sylvia, had planned a future full of activity and adventure, but within a year he had been diagnosed with dementia and this advanced rapidly, leaving Sylvia feeling unable to cope with her emotions of loss and fear.

It is worth remembering, however, that there are often many things that a person with dementia can do. With modification, the plans you’ve made together may still be relevant.

As communities become more dementia-friendly, there is a greater understanding of how to support people with dementia. There are even dementia-friendly holidays and activities available.

As a partner, you may feel that a future as a carer isn’t how you expected your relationship to evolve. You might feel unprepared. It’s helpful to remember that whatever your future caring role may become, you are still first and foremost a partner. Many people living with dementia actually dislike the term carer, when used to describe their partner.

If your partner’s dementia symptoms impact upon their ability to show affection, or maintain an intimate or sexual relationship, it is understandable that you could feel rejected.

Conversely, sometimes as a person’s dementia symptoms progress, they may demonstrate increased levels of sexual desire, or even direct that desire towards someone else.

This can be very upsetting for you, as their partner. However, it is important to recognise that this isn’t meant as a gesture to upset you, but a symptom of the dementia that needs as much support as any other symptom.

In every situation, however, drawing on the strength of your relationship, keeping alive memories of how you first became a couple, and supporting your partner to do likewise, can help to strengthen bonds. Some couples report developing an even deeper and more meaningful relationship by working together through the challenges that dementia has brought them.
WHEN A PARENT OR GRANDPARENT HAS DEMENTIA

If the person who has been diagnosed is a parent or grandparent, again a whole new mixture of relationship issues can come to the fore.

For younger children, it can be difficult to understand the changes in a parent or grandparent as the dementia symptoms progress. Alzheimer’s Research UK has created a website called ‘Dementia Explained’ to help young people better understand dementia.

The website, www.dementiaexplained.org provides child-friendly dementia information, focusing on the ways people with dementia can change and the effect this can have on families.

By bringing together a range of resources including stories narrated by the broadcaster, Edith Bowman, videos and interactive games, the site allows young people to discover more about the brain, how it is affected by dementia and share their experiences to help others.

Beth’s father had vascular dementia for 19 years, beginning when she was around 12. As his dementia progressed, their relationship changed from being a father/daughter relationship to Beth having to take on more responsibility and, in the end, feeling as though she had become a parent to her parent.

Coping with these changes wasn’t easy, but they didn’t happen overnight. The vast majority of the most difficult responsibilities came in the areas of being a next-of-kin and discussing do-not-resuscitate decisions, the latter happening in the last two to three years of her father’s life. Beth also had to take on roles such as advocating for her father and interpreting his needs when he could no longer communicate these clearly.

What she missed as her father’s dementia symptoms progressed was the ability to go to him, as a father, and get his advice and help, as well as sharing any problems she was having. The physical decline he experienced in his later years with dementia was also upsetting to witness. Yet, despite the difficulties, her abiding memories are of the strength of their relationship and the pride she had in being able to help and care for him, as he had helped and cared for her when she was growing up.

FAMILIES FROM DIFFERENT CULTURES

If the person living with dementia is from a different culture, you and they may have unique experiences.

As the person’s dementia symptoms progress, you may find that they revert back to a native language. They may find comfort in activities or food from their childhood, or their culture may become increasingly important to them.

You may find that there are culturally-specific services in your area, and if looking for formal support, a good provider should always take into account the person’s cultural background.
WHEN A FAMILY MEMBER HAS DEMENTIA

However, it is worth considering that some services may not be responsive to the individual needs of a person with dementia who is from a different culture. In these cases, look around for a service that is.

Whatever your connection to the person with dementia, it is likely that there will be gradual changes to your relationship. Being aware of these and adjusting to them with time will help. You may find some changes easier to manage than others, but remember, your response to the changes is natural and there is support out there to help you.

DAVID AND IRENE’S STORY

When my husband David was diagnosed, he was only 60. He was working as a company director and the first thing I noticed was that he had started scribbling notes down before making phone calls, which he had never done before.

What shocked me the most was how hard it was to get a diagnosis, David knew it wasn’t just ‘normal’ memory lapses, but we could not get a doctor to acknowledge it might be dementia. It was only out of luck we were put in touch with one of the top dementia doctors in the country, who diagnosed David with semantic dementia.

If you’re not sure, or you think something might be wrong, you have to make sure you push to find out. I think GPs should be more knowledgeable about the microelements of dementia. I also think the information should be more readily available, because having to find out most of the information on my own during the early stages just added to the stress.

My biggest piece of advice, having gone through this, is that you as a carer or family member have to make sure you look after yourself and seek respite care and help.

It got to the point with us that I was getting physically ill every day and eventually I was prescribed anti-depressants just to get through the day because of the stress of looking after David on my own.

You need to take care of yourself because if your health deteriorates you’re less helpful to your loved ones.

It was only after I first arranged for David to go on an Experience Day at Belong, which is a day for people to go and take part in activities and interact with others who might be going through a similar experience, that I realised how tired I had got.

I think that is why Belong’s Macclesfield village has been such a big help because they first recommended David needed full-time care. When David eventually moved into the village it was such a relief to me, which sounds horrible to say, but the stress was just so overwhelming, and at least I knew David was getting the quality care he needed.

Belong is quite unique because they employ an Admiral Nurse, who is a specialist dementia care nurse, and that makes everything so much easier for family members because you know your loved one is being treated properly.

It’s only after you get the chance to sit back and reflect that you realise how utterly overwhelming caring for someone in this situation can be. I think people don’t like to talk about dementia, it’s like the cancer of the 21st century because the word is so daunting, and so many carers carry on struggling.

My advice is to get help, but more definitely needs to be done to let people know that the help is out there for them.
When Jack needed to take a break, he made sure Mary was happy and comfortable, listening to the radio or watching the birds in the garden, something she enjoyed doing. He then took five minutes to make a cup of tea and read the paper.

People can live well with dementia. However, their symptoms can vary from day to day. Understanding the symptoms and how to manage them so you can all live well on a daily basis is important.

How much a person living with dementia understands about their symptoms and how they are progressing is completely individual. Some people have much more insight than others, and it’s important to reflect on the variations that can occur, and if their symptoms are particularly challenging, not feel that the person is being deliberately difficult.

As Kerry Kleinbergen, a person who lives with the symptoms of dementia, said in a graphic she created to express how her diagnosis of dementia was affecting her life, ‘The person with dementia is not giving you a hard time. The person with dementia is having a hard time.’

Be mindful that as a person’s dementia symptoms progress, their levels of understanding or awareness may decline. As a close relative or carer, you may find yourself having to explain things to them that you hadn’t had to explain previously or help them with tasks that they used to do unaided.

Patience and calmness are important qualities in these situations, and you may want to call upon coping strategies like silent counting in your head or deep breathing techniques, to keep your cool if you need to. Also, consider if there is anyone you can call upon if you need to, whether that’s to come over for a chat or to offer practical support. There is no shame in calling for assistance.

It is vital, whenever you support a person with dementia, to ensure that you don’t find yourself taking over from them. It can often seem easier, and quicker, to simply do things for a person. However, by doing this, you may be contributing to them becoming more disempowered; losing skills and, ultimately, relying on you more than they might otherwise need to.

I thought that by helping Dad to drink I was helping him to get in vital fluids that the doctor said he needed. When my sister came around with a pack of straws, Dad was able to drink by himself. I hadn’t even thought of it, but it meant he could drink when he wanted, and it was one less thing for me to have to do – although I always kept an eye on how much he was drinking and that he could reach the cup. Sometimes you need someone else’s perspective on things because you can’t see the wood for the trees.

Over time there will be some crucial aspects of daily living, like driving a car, crossing the road or operating household appliances that could put the person in danger as their dementia symptoms progress. These will obviously need to be carefully thought through. In relation to driving, a person who has been diagnosed with dementia has a duty to inform the DVLA, but that doesn’t necessarily mean they will have to immediately stop driving.

In terms of household safety, there are technological options that can help to keep a person with dementia safe in the home. These include sensors and simple devices that can prevent overflow situations when using the bath or basin or that indicate when the gas has been left on. It’s helpful to look into ways to make your home more dementia-friendly, and there is lots of guidance available.

The chapter on care and support, starting on page 45, explains this in more detail.

THE SYMPTOMS OF DEMENTIA AND THE CHANGES THEY BRING

No matter how the person’s dementia presents itself, and however frightened or apprehensive you may feel, as a family member you may feel far more empowered, and able to cope, once you have armed yourself with as much information as you can realistically take in.

If you are the sort of person who thrives on knowledge and takes an approach that ‘information is power’, you will undoubtedly benefit from doing as much research and accessing as many support services as possible. These may be online, printed, via helplines, face-to-face or from seeing a dementia adviser, an Admiral Nurse or attending carers’ or dementia support groups.

Even if you initially shut off from learning about dementia, over time you may find that you want to know more. It’s perfectly okay to decline help and then look for it again at a later date. Everyone has their own way of coping, and you shouldn’t feel that any doors to support are permanently shut. Sometimes people decline offers of information because they are fearful of learning about how dementia progresses but informing yourself now may help you to manage better should difficulties arise later on.

It’s important to remember that you are experiencing your relative’s dementia in your own unique way, which may be different to the views and emotions of other family members. These experiences are tied up with lots of emotional responses and linked to the specific relationship you have with the person with dementia. Sometimes these changes can feel overwhelming.

You may feel very isolated and invisible if any help offered by health or social care services is directed at the person living with dementia, rather than anyone asking how you are feeling and if you need any help. However, GPs and local authorities have a duty to consider the needs of family carers and should ask you about your caring role and any impact it has on you. Even if they don’t approach you, you have the right to ask them for an assessment of your own needs, see page 37. If you consider your needs early on and look after yourself, you will be in a better position to look after the person with dementia.

Don’t be afraid to admit how you’re feeling if you are finding things tough or if you need some extra support. Asking for help isn’t a sign of weakness or a reflection on your caring ability. It is an acknowledgement that you are human, and you need to look after yourself too. If you struggle to manage as a carer, it’s not only you who will need support, your relative will need to be looked after too. By seeking the support that you need, when you need it, you are caring for yourself as well as the person with dementia.

To manage my caring role, I read what I could, learnt from it, listened to other carers and joined forums. Although this is not always the best thing to do as a huge number of carers just tell their stories: how bad it is/ was for them. But we are managing very well and take a lot of flak for not bleating about the worst of it.

MANAGING YOUR FEELINGS

As fulfilling and rewarding as taking on a caring role can be, you may also experience feelings of guilt, anger and loneliness at one time or another. It is essential that you address your feelings as best you can, so that your own wellbeing is not affected.
Keep a diary of your feelings
By keeping a track of your emotions throughout the days and weeks, you may identify certain things that trigger particular feelings. If you know that one type of situation will make you feel a certain way, it may be easier to avoid in the future.

Ask for help
If you feel other family members should be helping out more, speak to them as early as possible to avoid tensions later on.

‘Take each day and situation as it comes. Be very patient and look for the positives.’

Talk to people
You may find it easier to talk with friends rather than family members as they’re not as emotionally involved in the situation.

‘I practise self-care, talk to a friend or my mentor. I do fun things, such as go to the cinema, go for a walk, meet up with friends.’

Let things go
There may be lots of niggles and stresses throughout your day. When you step back from the situation and look at it with a clear head, you may realise that it’s not worth causing you additional stress.

‘I cope with tricky situations by biting my tongue and not putting across my point of view. I also avoid trigger subjects.’

DAILY LIVING TECHNIQUES
The book, Confidence to Care by Molly Carpenter, published by the home care provider, Home Instead, sets out some techniques to help support the person with dementia, and any specific dementia symptoms, on a daily basis. These are tried and tested but not everybody will feel comfortable applying them all. It is down to personal preference whether you try them.

• Give simple choices. By supporting the person with dementia to make simple choices, you are enabling them to have control.

• Maintain their routine. Life story records can help you to understand and, therefore, follow your loved one’s routine.

• Be flexible. If the person with dementia changes their routine or something they usually do, be flexible. Try to adapt to the changes as best you can, as long as the changes aren’t causing anyone any harm.

• Live in their moment. For example, it can be distressing for someone with dementia who is asking after a deceased parent to be told that the person has passed away. By living in their moment, you can help to reduce any distress that may be caused.

• Redirect. Redirection can be a useful tool in changing a mood, topic or subject as well as moving the person from an environment, or situation, that may be distressing or upsetting to them. This could even be changing the subject of a conversation to something familiar and comforting, looking out of the window at birds or traffic outside, opening their life story record or getting out treasured items.
• If something has upset the person you support, and you are unable to calm them down, you may want to consider taking the blame and apologising for the situation. It may help to diffuse things – however, this may not be effective in every situation and you may not feel comfortable with this.

• Take a break. If you feel that a situation is getting on top of you, try to take a break. If the person you are supporting is comfortable and safe, take five minutes to yourself. If you find you need someone to help support the person with dementia while you have some time to yourself, don’t be afraid to call on a friend or family member, support group or neighbour. Looking after yourself is as important as looking after the person with dementia.

KEEPING BUSY – HOBBIES AND PASTIMES

Keeping busy with a variety of activities is considered, by many people, to be vital in slowing down the progression of dementia. Activity and occupation can be anything that the person with dementia and you, as their family member or friend, want it to be. The social care provider, Care UK, has produced a useful guide to dementia-friendly family days out which is available on its website. The National Activity Providers Association has a number of useful publications, including a book of activities, that are available to purchase from its online shop.

A person with dementia may continue to enjoy hobbies and pastimes that have been life-long pleasures, or they may lose interest in these activities. It is important that you, family members or friends don’t force the person to do something that they are losing interest in. Although it may be upsetting to see someone you care about discarding something you have previously strongly associated with them, see these changes as a chance to introduce the possibility of other activities that they haven’t previously tried.

> Anything from a cup of tea to walking around the block.

In these situations, you may find that compiling their life story record or expanding upon it, can be very helpful in bringing your family together in a new, shared endeavour to create this resource that everyone can benefit from and enjoy.

For more information on this, see the planning chapter starting on page 15.

Dementia should never be seen as a barrier to enjoying a particular activity (even if that activity has to be modified) or trying new things. Learning something new, be it a language, musical instrument or technology, can be revitalising for a person with dementia and give you, or other family members, or friends, something to engage in together. It may be that it is something that the person with dementia can be supported with by someone else, while you take a break. You may find befriending services in your local area that could be helpful in these circumstances.

Also, bear in mind that the tasks of daily living are activities in their own right. For example, cooking or folding the laundry. Engaging the person with dementia in these tasks can help to bring you closer together through regularly shared experiences. Using simple prompts, which may just be signs, such as words and pictures, around the home and on cupboard doors to identify what is kept where can help the person with dementia to participate in these activities more independently.

Also consider day services that might be available... in your area. These may be held in community halls or local care homes. They can offer a welcome change of scenery for the person with dementia and you. You may be able to drop them off and take a couple of hours for yourself. They may have a carers group at the same time where you can relax and have a cup of tea or chat with other people who are caring for someone.

I visited the local care homes where day care was provided to see which one would suit my husband’s needs. He started at a care centre just one day a week at first, but this was unsuitable as they liked their customers to sit at tables playing cards or dominoes or doing sit-down activities. My husband just wanted to wander around all the time. They said he didn’t fit in so he had to leave. The second place was adequate, but not very successful as it was more for the later stages of the disease and although I knew he was safe, he wasn’t happy. Then I heard about Hartsholme House, which was quite close, although traffic and train barriers were obstacles. I gave it a try.

From pulling into the drive, I felt it would be right for him. It was modern and spacious. I was so impressed with my tour around the building and the garden was light and open. Staff were lovely and friendly and just what he needed. This was completely right for him, and he loves it. He wanders around the large garden which is beautifully set out, and even has a chicken coop. He could do crafts, singing and all sorts of activities or he could wander safely around with all the staff there to keep a watchful eye on him.

There are lounges, sitting rooms and a restaurant. He loves it and calls it his club. He has made many friends among other day care users, residents and, of course, the lovely caring staff, fully qualified to look after this lovely man, who is the most precious thing in my life.

I feel happy and comfortable, relieved and content when I leave him there because he is safe and caringly looked after. I know that if I needed help at any time, if they could, they would accommodate, help and advise me.

My husband is safe and happy; I have peace of mind. What more could I ask? It’s like a second home to him.

Details of local services start on page 65.

Respite care may also be available to you. Respite is another name for a short break, where the person with dementia can be supported either at home or in a care setting, whilst their carer takes a break. It can be invaluable to help carers recharge and do something for themselves.

MY EXPERIENCE OF ALZHEIMER’S BY CAROL BRANDON

When my lovely, kind, caring soulmate, the man who supported and protected me for all my married life, was diagnosed with Alzheimer’s, I had no experience of the disease.

As we left the hospital, the fear of what was ahead left me with a terrible pain in my heart that made me want to be physically sick. I was so frightened. I had no idea where to turn to for advice and I know he felt just the same.

My husband is a ‘wait and see’ person but I knew, from the then only slight change in his personality, that I needed help.

My first contact was Alzheimer’s Society who pointed me to an Alzheimer’s café where I could meet people in the same position as myself. From other carers, I heard that some care homes provide day care. I knew this was what we needed for both our sakes. I was spending all day, every day keeping him occupied, taking him out and about and answering repetitive questions.
THERAPIES AND MEDICATION

There are numerous interventions that can come under the banner of therapies – everything from massage, yoga, aromatherapy and physical exercise to music, meditation, blogging and brain training exercises.

There are some fantastic examples of people with dementia who are living well having used various therapeutic strategies, including Chris Roberts. Chris has a blog at www.mason4233.wordpress.com and keeps himself active by speaking at public events and training people to become Dementia Friends.

Kate Swaffer is living with dementia in Australia. She uses a variety of different therapies to keep her dementia symptoms in check. On her blog, www.kateswaffer.com Kate discusses the various interventions she uses and looks at therapeutic interventions generally.

A local memory clinic may offer different therapeutic interventions after a diagnosis of dementia – most commonly this is likely to be cognitive behavioural therapy or cognitive stimulation therapy. You may also find different therapy groups in the local area, which may be specific to helping people with dementia. Although, beware of anything that claims to produce miracle results.

Depending on the type of dementia a person is diagnosed with, they may also be offered different medications to help slow down the progression of symptoms. Currently, there are no pharmacological treatments to prevent or reverse dementia, and you should remember that any medication a person with dementia may be offered may or may not be effective and could also involve side-effects.

If the person with dementia has other conditions and is already on medications, or has different medications prescribed in the future, check how these are likely to interact with each other. It’s also a good idea to request a medication review either from the GP or local pharmacist (or indeed both if you want to get a second opinion). It is important to ensure that the person living with dementia isn’t taking any more medication than is necessary and to report any side-effects. If a person is on lots of different medications, it can help to keep a daily record of these with the option to add in comments about any negative effects that occurred after a particular medicine was taken.

PRACTICAL ASPECTS OF LIVING WITH DEMENTIA

Every person approaches supporting someone with dementia, and any potential caring role, in a different way. There is no right or wrong. In the early days, it might be a case of managing emotional changes, differences in the relationship that you once had. This can be difficult, and you may develop ways of approaching situations or feel the need to ask for support.

"I manage by evolving to the new changes and nuances on a daily basis. I do not dwell on the loss of affection or closeness that we once had. I do not play games as in getting huffy because he won’t hold my hand. I tried that, it had no effect on him and made me feel worse. If I cannot change something, I change my own mind to it. The situation is exactly the same, but mindset is different, therefore whatever ‘it’ is, isn’t so bad."

You may find you are very good at providing practical help, like washing and dressing. Maybe your strengths lie in advocating for the person with dementia in meetings or appointments or sitting with them while you share a pastime or hobby.

Different family members may have different strengths and take on different roles too. Don’t be afraid to ask them to assist or be involved.

Over time, if you are supporting someone on your own, you may discover abilities you didn’t think you had and have to overcome difficult challenges.

PERSONAL CARE TASKS

Tommy has a YouTube channel, Tommy onTour. The issues Tommy describes in an interview on YouTube, namely around caring for a family member of the opposite sex, get to the heart of the dignity and privacy concerns that many carers struggle with.

"When caring for his mum, Joan, Tommy struggled with more personal aspects of caring when he needed to help her bathe."

At first you may feel very uncomfortable helping with more intimate care – for example, washing, using the toilet or getting dressed – and that is a perfectly normal reaction that many carers report. If the person with dementia is your partner, you may still feel very uncomfortable, not because you aren’t used to seeing them in a state of undress, but because you are helping them with personal care that previously they would have done themselves. If the person is your parent, you may be helping them with intimate aspects of life that you had never considered – even seeing them undressed may make you feel uncomfortable.

Taking your time, acknowledging your feelings and, if necessary, seeking practical or emotional help from health or social care professionals, is vital if you are struggling with this type of caring.

You may also worry about whether you are offering care and support in the ‘correct’ way. You may be fearful of unintentionally hurting the person living with dementia or doing something that causes additional distress or discomfort. In these circumstances, it can be helpful to look into the possibility of having some training. What provision you have in your local area for family
Carer training can vary, and many areas still have no official training available for families who are caring for a relative. However, you could be proactive and approach a local care home to see if they would allow you to visit. The person with dementia could be looked after whilst you, as their carer, join in some of the training being given to care staff.

"Jenny was struggling to get her husband, Michael, in and out of the car until care home staff showed her the techniques they had learnt for helping a person with limited mobility to move from one position to another. That help was invaluable and enabled them to continue to get out and about in their local area."

In common with many carers, you may find that as a person’s dementia symptoms progress, supporting them with mobility or incontinence are two of the most difficult aspects of caring. Recognising this, and being prepared, may help you to manage. It is also worth bearing in mind that paid care workers are meant to receive specific training in ‘moving and handling’ and supporting a person with incontinence, so don’t feel that you have failed if you don’t know how to approach these challenges. Many of the skills of caring don’t come naturally, and you may find that you will need extra help, either in the form of training, help in sourcing and using equipment, or from professional home care workers who can assist you with difficult tasks.

If you and the person with dementia attend any dementia day services, you may find that the staff there are trained and could give you advice. They may also be able to point you in the right direction of any training or other knowledgeable people.

Adapting the home

Be mindful that there are often things that you can do to modify the home environment to help delay any potential decline in the abilities of the person with dementia. Examples include: using signage or lights to help guide the way to the toilet, ensuring flooring is uniform (differences in floor surfaces can lead to a person with dementia not wanting to enter a room, such as the bathroom or cloakroom). Likewise, maintaining an exercise regime and seeking treatment for any joint problems can help people to remain mobile for longer. There are different approaches on what can help people live well with dementia in their own home. It is worth researching these in more detail and trying some out.

"I wish I’d received practical advice, such as what equipment was available and how long it would take to come."

Caring from a distance

There are unique challenges when you care from a distance, as many family members increasingly do if their relative is diagnosed with dementia and living alone in a different part of the country. There are lots of things you can do to help your relative, even if you aren’t with them, including using different technologies to communicate and remind them about certain activities, like taking medication or eating; and adapting their home to help them remain independent for longer.
COMMON CONDITIONS

Dementia rarely exists in isolation, and many people who are living with dementia also live with other conditions such as hypertension (high blood pressure), digestive problems (including irritable bowel syndrome, constipation or diarrhoea), heart problems (including chronic obstructive pulmonary disease), bone, joint and muscle problems (including osteoporosis and arthritis), breathing problems (such as asthma), skin problems (including eczema), learning disabilities and many different cancers. It is known that pain is often poorly understood and treated in people with dementia, and as a person’s dementia advances they may find it more difficult to express whether and where they have pain and to request treatment, which can be particularly difficult and upsetting for you too.

Sensory loss
It is also important to be mindful of sensory loss in a person who is living with dementia. The person with dementia may need glasses or hearing aids, which they will need to be assessed for. They may develop different conditions related to their ears or eyes – for example, macular degeneration is a possibility as eyes age. Be mindful that it can be common for people with dementia to find it difficult to adapt to wearing glasses or hearing aids, and some people may even refuse to wear them when, prior to their dementia, they would have always worn them. Speak to a professional if you face this issue and ask if there is anything you can do to help the situation.

Oral health
It’s vital too that the dental health of the person with dementia is monitored. Over time it may become more difficult to maintain a good oral hygiene routine, and the expert input of a dentist, who is trained in treating people with dementia, is important to help prevent other health issues developing as a result of tooth decay. If the person with dementia needs to wear dentures, you should be prepared that over time these may become another item that they no longer want to use.
Eating and drinking
People with dementia are also at increased risk of dehydration and malnutrition. They may forget to eat and drink, or their tastes may change. You may find yourself becoming frustrated if the foods and drinks that you are preparing aren’t being consumed like they used to be. However, try to experiment with different flavours (sometimes stronger flavours help) or textures of food, introduce more finger food, and in the case of dehydration, try to make sure that the person with dementia has access to a variety of drinks as well as foods that are high in water, such as some fruits. Their GP can also prescribe food supplements if malnutrition is a concern.

As a person’s dementia progresses, they may develop dysphagia (swallowing problems). If you suspect the person with dementia is struggling with their swallowing, you should ask their GP for a referral to a speech and language therapist. The speech and language therapist will carry out an assessment and may recommend that you thicken foods and drinks. A thickener may be prescribed. They may give advice on the best posture for eating and offer different strategies with foods and drinks to make them easier and safer to eat, including puréeing food. If the person with dementia is having problems with swallowing, this can lead to an increased risk of chest infections, so it’s important to keep a close eye on them to catch any early signs of chest problems.

Mental health
It is also important to remember that alongside changes to physical health, a person with dementia could also have, or develop, mental health issues. Two of the most common examples are depression and delirium. Such mental health conditions need specialist help, and medication or other therapeutic interventions may be offered. If you are concerned about the mental health of someone with dementia, you should talk to their GP.

Hospital
If the person with dementia needs to go into hospital, you might like to consider completing a document like Alzheimer’s Society’s This is me to help hospital staff know a little more about the person. It is a simplified life story document. There is also a campaign, growing in momentum, to give carers the right to remain with the person they are caring for when they are in hospital. It is called John’s Campaign – For the right to stay with people with dementia in hospital, visit www.johnscampaign.org.uk

For more information on hospital stays, see page 52.

Mobility
If the person with dementia’s mobility decreases, they may become more susceptible to pressure ulcers. There are lots of pressure-relieving products on the market, and if they are becoming increasingly less mobile, you should speak to their GP to get an assessment of their mobility and details of any products that can help to prevent skin damage.
Top tips from an Admiral Nurse

Admiral Nurse, Caroline Clifton works for Belong and supports carers and families of people with dementia. As a specialist mental health nurse, she helps increase understanding of techniques to support people with dementia. Here are her top tips for family members and professionals.

1 If the person with dementia is not a close relative, get to know the person.
   ✓ Know their likes and dislikes.
   ✓ Gather life history.
   ✓ Have three points of conversation.

2 Maintain eye contact and smile.
   The person with dementia will notice:
   ✓ Your emotional state.
   ✓ Your body language.
   ✓ Tone of voice.

3 Slow down.
   ✓ Provide support in a relaxed manner.
   ✓ Help the person to do things for themselves.
   ✓ Keep it simple.

4 Introduce yourself every time if they are uncertain of who you are.
   ✓ Tell the person your name.
   ✓ Tell them what you are there for.
   ✓ Refer to the person by their name.

5 Communicate clearly.
   ✓ Talk about one thing at a time.
   ✓ Offer simple choices.
   ✓ Speak clearly in a warm, calm voice.

6 Step into the person’s world.
   If the person becomes upset:
   ✓ Reassure the person.
   ✓ Acknowledge that you can see the person is upset.
   ✓ Validate what the person is saying or doing.

7 Keep it quiet.
   ✓ Create a relaxed environment.
   ✓ Stop, listen and avoid distraction.
   ✓ Reduce conflicting noises.
   ✓ Avoid crowds and lots of noise.

8 Don’t argue or quibble.
   ✓ Go with the flow.
   ✓ Acknowledge and respect what the person is saying and doing.
   ✓ Telling them they are wrong may have a negative effect.

9 Engage and encourage.
   ✓ Get the person started with a meaningful activity.
   ✓ Set up activities to succeed so that there is a positive outcome.
   ✓ Focus on what the person can do.

10 Talk with others.
   ✓ Share your experiences with others.
   ✓ Talk together about what has happened and how you dealt with the situation.
   ✓ Record what has helped and what has not for future reference.

With thanks to Caroline Clifton, Admiral Nurse, Belong.
Looking after you

Carers regularly look after, help or support someone who wouldn’t be able to manage everyday life without their help. A carer doesn’t have to be living with the person they care for, and the help they give doesn’t have to be physical. The carer may be caring for a partner, another relative, a friend or a neighbour.

If you’re not sure if you’re a carer, consider whether you help with the following tasks:

- Personal care, such as washing and dressing.
- Going to the toilet, or dealing with incontinence.
- Eating or taking medicines.
- Getting about at home or outside.
- Practical help at home, keeping them company.
- Emotional support or communicating.

If you are taking on any of these tasks, it’s likely that you are a carer. If you are undertaking a caring role for the person with dementia, you should make your GP aware of this. If your GP is different from the GP of the person with dementia, it is worth making both doctors aware of your role. It is important that you look after your health and consider your needs, this will enable you to look after the person with dementia.

“I would have liked to have known what I was entitled to or what was available in my local area – respite care, carers’ groups and benefits advice.”
You should ask your GP for an assessment of your health and your needs as a carer. This is separate from the assessment the person with dementia may have and is very much an appointment about you and helping you to maintain your health and look after yourself so that you can care effectively.

I wish I’d had more regular contact with my GP.

You may also want to request a carers’ assessment from your local council. This is different from any GP assessment and should look at other aspects of your life including your ability to carry on caring. Your assessment may be carried out at the same time as that of the person with dementia. However, they do not have to have an assessment if they don’t want to. Also, if you wish to speak in private about your caring role, this is also completely possible. In those circumstances, you can have an assessment on your own.

A common reason for assessments to happen together is because support for you, as a carer, might be best met by services provided to the person you care for. Respite care and short breaks may be provided to the person you are caring for, but they will enable you to take a break from your caring role.

However it is carried out, it is important to be as open and honest as you can during your assessment so that the person carrying out the assessment fully understands your situation.

BENEFITS

There are a number of State benefits that you, and the person living with dementia, may be able to apply for. These could include:

- Attendance Allowance.
- Personal Independence Payments.
- Carer’s Allowance.
- Council Tax reductions.
- Income Support.
- Pension Credit.
- Savings Credit.

It is important to have a full benefit check for both yourself and the person living with dementia. Also, make sure the situation is reviewed occasionally, especially as any dementia symptoms progress. Local support organisations may be able to help you carry out a full benefits check, these may be carer support groups, dementia groups, Age UK or Citizens Advice.

For more information on local services, see page 65. Alternatively, the Money Advice Service offers free and impartial financial advice.

CARING WHILST WORKING

If you are in employment, you may want to talk to your employer about your caring responsibilities. As a carer, you may have the right to request flexible working depending on certain criteria, however, it is not guaranteed that you will receive it. Carers UK has a useful information on caring whilst in employment. It is under the ‘Help and Advice’ tab on its website.

Deciding to tell your employer that you have caring responsibilities is very personal. You do not need to disclose this information; however, it may help you to access certain legal rights and additional support.

Your company handbook may also contain details of any company policies to support carers.
PRACTICAL SUPPORT

In terms of practical support, national organisations like Alzheimer’s Society, Dementia UK, Age UK, Carers Trust and Carers UK all provide carers’ services in various forms, including online, leaflets, helplines and face-to-face support groups.

“You may also have some independent carers’ services in your area (services that aren’t linked to a national organisation) – the local sources starting on page 65, an internet search, a leaflet from your GP surgery or an enquiry via your local Citizens Advice should be able to locate these for you. In addition, there is specialist support from Young Dementia UK if the person you are caring for has been diagnosed at a younger age.

Some services may offer forms of training for carers, via workshops or information sessions. It might be worth contacting a local carers’ organisation to find out if there’s anything available in your area.

“I would have benefited from finding an online community for me, as a carer. Since I have discovered Twitter and social media I have realised that there is always someone out there to talk to.”

If difficult situations arise, you may benefit from seeking an advocate, either for yourself or the person with dementia, to provide support in meetings and when dealing with professionals.

There is a national ‘Carers Week’ held every June. You may find that during that time there are events happening in your local area which may be helpful to you.

There is also an annual National Dementia Carers Day, visit www.nationaldementiacarersday.org.uk for information.

Alongside these awareness-raising events, there is an annual Dementia Awareness Week run by Alzheimer’s Society every May and World Alzheimer’s Month, co-ordinated by Alzheimer’s Disease International, is every September.

During these times, you may find more coverage of dementia in the media, and dementia-specific events being held in your area that could provide useful support and advice.

If you are a young carer, or your children or teenagers are involved in the care of a person with dementia, there are some specific resources that have been made by, and for, younger age groups. The NHS Choices website sets out rights of young carers. Barnardo’s and other organisations can support young carers.

You may also find yourself in the position of a ‘Sandwich Carer’, which is the name given to a person who is looking after young children and... caring for ageing parents. This can be a delicate balancing act and it’s important to seek support to help you. You do not have to undertake everything yourself, in isolation.

SUPPORT

No matter what form your support or caring role takes, you may find you benefit from peer support and mentoring.

Talking to other carers or family members, either through carers’ groups, online forums such as Alzheimer’s Society’s Talking Point or social media may be useful for you in helping you connect with others and get support with any practical or emotional issues that you are experiencing.

There are also specific organisations that can help carers, including the Together in Dementia Everyday network.

I managed by speaking to people who had cared for a person with dementia. I was assigned a mentor who had been a carer. She taught me coping strategies that included arranging activities that were nourishing and enjoyable. She was my lifeline.

WHAT IF I CAN’T CARRY ON CARING?

If your caring role begins to feel too much for you, it is best to do something about it as soon as possible. It may help to talk to other family members first and ask for their advice. When alternative care for the person with dementia starts to be discussed, it is likely to provoke an emotional response amongst your family. However, it is important not to feel pressured into something you feel like you can’t carry on with.

You may want to contact your local authority to ask them to undertake an assessment of the person with dementia, even if they have been assessed before. Their needs may have changed or increased. The outcome of any new assessment will help to inform your decisions about what to do for the best. The local authority may also offer you information and advice or direct you to specific services that can support you.

Depending on the circumstances, respite care may be a suitable solution. This gives you as the carer time to yourself, knowing that your loved one is cared for. Respite can be arranged on a regular basis or just when needed and can last anywhere from a few days to a number of weeks.

For more information on formal care and support, see page 46.

The publisher of this Guide also has a website containing information on seeking care and support for a family member and how to cope with the emotional situations that may arise during the process. Visit www.carechoices.co.uk.

Caring for someone with dementia can be very rewarding and be a natural part of your relationship. However, don’t forget to look after yourself and access any support you may need to carry on caring.
People you may meet

There is a wide range of health and social care services that support people with dementia and their families. For some people, meeting so many new professionals in a short space of time can feel overwhelming, so it may be helpful to know who they are and what they do.

Every day can be different when someone has dementia, don’t assume it will be the same.

The professionals may be employed by the NHS or local authority, private businesses or voluntary organisations. Here are details of just some of the professionals you may meet.

GPs

The local GP will probably have been your first point of contact. The GP is the one who may offer a diagnosis of dementia, refer you to a consultant doctor or a memory clinic, or consider your health needs as a carer.

CONSULTANTS

These are doctors who have had extensive training and experience in a particular area.

There are different types of consultants, and who people are referred to will depend on their symptoms and how the services in the local area... are arranged. The consultant may be a:

- Neurologist – specialists in disorders of the brain and nervous system.
- Geriatrician – specialists in the physical illnesses and disabilities of old age and the care of older people.
- Psychiatrist – specialists in diagnosing and treating a range of mental health conditions.
- Old age psychiatrist – psychiatrists who have had further training in the mental health conditions of older people.

The consultant will work with other professionals, including nurses, social workers and occupational therapists.

CLINICAL PSYCHOLOGISTS

Clinical psychologists assess memory, learning abilities and other skills, and can offer support. They often work with consultants in memory clinics, as part of a team.

---

NURSES, DISTRICT NURSES OR COMMUNITY MENTAL HEALTH NURSES

Nurses support people in hospital, undertake procedures at the GP surgery or will be based in the community. They may make home visits, or you may meet them in a healthcare setting. They may carry out assessments in the home and offer treatment, care and support.

They are likely to be able to advise on how people with dementia, and those supporting them, can improve their quality of life and general health.

ADMIRAL NURSES

These are dementia specialist nurses. They are trained to give practical guidance and solutions alongside emotional support to people with dementia, and their family members or carers. They tailor their vast knowledge and understanding of dementia to support the unique needs of each individual and their family. Admiral Nurses can provide the emotional and psychological support that people may need.

Acting as a stepping stone to the different parts of the health and social care system, Admiral Nurses can also help to connect all aspects of care for people living with dementia and ensure that everybody’s needs are being met.

More recently, Admiral Nurses are linking with care organisations and are, themselves, supported in their professional development by Dementia UK.

People living with dementia could be referred to Admiral Nurses by their GP or you can find a local team online at www.dementiauk.org/get-support/find-an-admiral-nurse

OCCUPATIONAL THERAPISTS (OTS)

OTs can advise on adaptations and equipment for the home, and on ways of maintaining independence for as long as possible. Some OTs work for the health service, some for social care and some privately. If you think an OT might be helpful, ask your GP, consultant or social worker. You may be referred, or you can contact private OTs directly.
SPEECH AND LANGUAGE THERAPISTS
These therapists are able to advise on ways of communicating more effectively and on eating or drinking if the person with dementia is experiencing swallowing difficulties.

CONTINENCE ADVISERS
Some areas may have a continence adviser who can assist with continence issues. They can also give information on useful equipment, ranging from commodes to incontinence pads. The GP may make a referral to an adviser, or you may be able to get in touch directly.

DIETITIANS
A professionally qualified dietitian can provide advice and guidance about food, nutrition and issues such as a poor appetite, weight loss, weight gain, vitamins and food supplements. Your GP or consultant can arrange for a referral to a dietitian. Some dietitians may be able to offer home visits (including to care homes), while others may be based at a local health centre or hospital.

CHIROPODISTS
Maintaining mobility is much easier when you have healthy, pain-free feet. NHS chiropody (sometimes known as podiatry) can be accessed through the GP but there are restrictions on eligibility, so check with the GP first. Alternatively, consider a private chiropodist.

EARS, TEETH AND EYE PROFESSIONALS
Though these things may not be the first issues people think about if living with a diagnosis of dementia, issues with these parts of the body can greatly impact on a person’s wellbeing. They can increase levels of confusion, distress or discomfort. It is important to get checked regularly and find professionals who have an understanding of the specific health considerations of someone with dementia. A referral to an audiologist, dentist or optometrist may be made through the GP. Alternatively, you may already be in touch with these services or find them on the high street.

SOCIAL WORKERS
Sometimes referred to as care managers, social workers have specific training and qualifications. They are usually involved in assessing a person’s social care needs and eligibility for services as well as in planning, co-ordinating and advising on services to meet those needs.

CARE WORKERS
Care workers are formally-trained to help with day-to-day activities such as personal care, washing and dressing, housework and emptying commodes, preparing meals, prompting to take medication at the right times and accompanying people on social activities or to appointments.
What dementia taught me

As a nurse, it was easy to assume that I’d know exactly what to do should one of my loved ones be diagnosed with dementia. However, while I had a lot of knowledge of the practical realities of dementia, the emotional reality is something you can never predict.

My mother, Josie, was diagnosed with vascular dementia aged 69. My husband and I noticed that she started to repeat herself during our conversations, and suggested she go for an assessment. As it happens, my mum had had the same idea; she had already made an appointment.

Even though we’d had our suspicions, the diagnosis was still hard to hear. In a way it didn’t really bother my mum, because she quickly forgot about it and carried on. But I couldn’t do that. Finding out that a loved one is ill is never easy, but that’s only the beginning. You don’t think about all of the things that come with it.

It was hard, but I eventually learned to accept help when I needed it. For a long time I felt I was the only person who could look after my mum, but it became overwhelming, especially as her condition worsened. I’d advise anybody in this position to get in touch with your local services, and remember that support is there for you, as well as your loved one.

About three years after her diagnosis, living independently, or even semi-independently, was no longer an option. It was devastating for my mum to leave the family home, which made it a traumatic experience for us all, but I knew moving into some kind of sheltered accommodation was the best option. My research led me to Belong Warrington.

My mum moved into an apartment at Belong and made the most of the fantastic home care service, Belong at Home. She also went along to the Experience Days, which are activity days for people with dementia to help them get involved and interact with others in a similar situation to their own.

I honestly couldn’t recommend them enough. Even with a big network of friends and family, dementia can be incredibly isolating, but my mum was able to make new friends who understood her situation and get back some of her independence. It was also an opportunity for me to take some time for myself, which was something I often neglected.

Looking back, I can see that it has been a learning curve, even after working as a nurse for many years. If I’d known how brilliant the staff at Belong would be, especially during mum’s transition into a full-time care household, where she currently lives, both of our lives would have been much less stressful.

While it can be hard for somebody living with dementia to move into a new home, remember that you’re doing it for their wellbeing.

I’d also recommend looking around your local area to find activities that they can get involved in and accept the help that’s out there – for your loved one and yourself.

With thanks to Gill Byrne and Belong Warrington.
Care and support needs

As a person’s dementia symptoms progress, you or they may need some help or support on a daily basis. There are differing levels of support, from simple home aids which help with tasks that are becoming more difficult, through to formal social care support from a home care provider and onto residential care.

Many people are surprised by what is available and the difference it can make to them and the person with dementia.

ASSISTANCE WITH DAILY LIVING

Simple aids and adaptations around the house can make a huge difference to someone’s independence. They can be subtle and unobtrusive to help manage everyday tasks. These could include medicine dispensers, cupboard labels or pictures, contrasting coloured crockery or large-handled utensils. There is a wealth of different items.

There is also an increasing number of electronic devices or assistive technology products on the market that can offer support to someone with dementia. These can include sensors that indicate when the gas or water is left on, devices that notify if someone leaves the house and voice commands to remind your loved one of specific actions. You can even record the messages yourself to offer a familiar voice.
If you’re not sure where to start, an occupational therapist may be able to help. If you’re not in touch with the local authority’s adult social care department, then you may need to make contact in order to access an occupational therapist. However, if there is an independent living centre nearby, they may have in-house occupational therapists. Some independent living centres are open to the public, whereas others are run by the local authority and you may need an appointment. Contact your local centre for more information. Alternatively, there are a growing number of private occupational therapists. A quick search online may find one local to you.

For online information on what you may find useful, the Living Made Easy website offers help and advice on daily living as well as details on equipment. For more information, visit www.livingmadeeasy.org.uk. The website works in conjunction with AskSARA, which can also help you find useful advice and products that make daily living easier, visit www.asksara.org.uk

GROWING SUPPORT NEEDS

You or another friend or relative may be supporting the person with dementia on a daily basis. However, there is likely to come a time when their needs increase or the person who supports them regularly requires a break. It is at this point that you’re likely to come into contact with formal care and support services.

Support can range from home help, assisting around the house with housework, shopping, cooking etc., through to assistance with personal care needs. Personal care can include helping the person with dementia to get dressed, assisting them in having a shower or going to the bathroom, or supporting them to eat or take their medication. See below for more information on the different types of formal care and support.

Depending on the situation, you may want to contact the local authority for an assessment of the person’s care needs. This can help to identify what health and social care needs they may have and how to meet them.

Alternatively, you can contact private care and support providers who will also assess your loved one as part of the initial care planning process. Even if you have contacted the local authority, it may be that after an assessment you are advised (perhaps because of your financial situation, for example) that you need to contact a private organisation to find suitable support. Either way, it is important that the person with dementia’s needs are fully assessed to enable you to find the right support for them.

FORMAL CARE AND SUPPORT

There are various different levels of formal care and support.

Home help
Home help offers support with a range of household jobs, including cooking, shopping, gardening, companionship and help with getting to and from social activities or appointments, some even undertake small maintenance jobs.

Home help doesn’t include personal care. If the person living with dementia doesn’t have any specific care needs but would benefit from some additional company or help with small jobs around the home, then home help could be the right choice.

Home care
Home care is also known as domiciliary care. It involves trained care staff assisting the person with dementia with personal care tasks. These can include: getting up in the morning, washing, showering, bathing and dressing; preparing meals and helping with eating, if needed; help with any specific needs, including prompting to take medication; help to get to bed at night and helping with mobility – home care staff have specific training covering moving, handling and the use of hoists.

Care staff can visit your relative’s home every day, for as long as is needed to meet their needs. Before a routine is set in place, visits should be arranged between the agency, the person with dementia, you or anyone who may offer regular, unpaid support and anyone else who may be able to advise on your loved one’s care and support needs. The visit will look at the person with dementia’s specific care needs and how they will best be met with support. A clear care and support plan will then be drafted.

The care plan means everyone knows when visits are to be expected and which tasks the care assistant will undertake. Visits can vary depending on individual needs and care assistants can visit more than once a day if needed. Typically, care services are available from 7am until 10pm. Nightsitting is also a possibility and can help if your loved one experiences difficulties sleeping at night and the person supporting them at home needs to get a good night’s rest.

The hourly rates for this type of service vary depending on the specific services required, the time visits are arranged for and the location. Always ask for a clear breakdown of costs, any additional charges and whether they are reviewed annually before deciding on an agency.

Live-in care
If your relative has round-the-clock care and support needs but would like to remain at home, 24-hour live-in care may suit them. Live-in care can be an alternative to a care or nursing home and can be an option for family carers to take a short break.

As well as all the tasks you would expect a care assistant to help with, live-in carers can also become great companions and provide assistance with other tasks, including running the household and accompanying them on social activities.

Care homes
Care homes and care homes with nursing offer 24-hour care and support to people who are no longer able to live independently in their own home and require more intensive care than home care is able to provide.

Care homes offer assistance with personal care needs, whereas nursing homes have registered nurses on the staff to undertake any specific nursing needs. The media gives a poor impression of care homes, however, the right care home can make a huge difference to someone’s quality of life.

Every care home is different and making the right choice to meet your relative’s particular needs, preferences and personality is the most important thing. There are thousands of care homes in England, however, it’s important to ensure that the staff in the homes you are looking at have received training in supporting someone with dementia and can meet the person’s specific needs.

Housing with care
If the person with dementia’s needs are such that they are unable to live independently at home but don’t necessarily require the support that a care home might offer, they could consider moving into a housing with care scheme. Housing with care offers a mid-ground for people with care and support needs, with a combination of services and independent living. This can promote a person’s wellbeing, giving them back independence they may have feared lost. It can also enable partners to stay together when the other option is for the person with dementia to enter a care home.

Housing with care is a catch-all term that can cover a lot of different schemes, offering all levels of support. Some schemes will be more suited to people with lower care and support needs while others can cater for people with more complex needs requiring high levels of support. Typically, people can buy or rent a property on the site and have care and support services provided by a contracted company. There is likely to be a community alarm system and access to services such as meals on wheels and home care. The amount of support the person with dementia can receive in a housing with care scheme can change, depending on their level of needs.

SPECIALIST DEMENTIA CARE

Relationships are a huge part of life. We all value them, they are important to us and our lives. This means that they are just as important when considering care and support. Whenever you interact with services – health, social care or other support, it’s important that they see the person with dementia as a person first and foremost. This is where life story planning can come into play. Basing care and support on good relationships and communication is essential to building person-centred care. This should be a consideration for any care and support services you may consider.

When looking for care for a person with dementia, it can be hard to differentiate those providers who say they support people with dementia from those who have had specialist training in providing care that is tailored to the particular needs of people with the condition. Although every care provider can tick a box to say they support people with dementia, there are several things to look out for to find those providers that go the extra mile.

If you are looking for home care or domiciliary care, speak to the manager, in depth, about how they support people with dementia and any specific training staff may have. The person with dementia is likely to respond better to someone supporting them if it is the same person each time. This enables them to become accustomed to that person coming into their house.

With this in mind, you may want to ask what happens when the usual care worker is away – will alternative care be arranged? Will you be informed by the agency when somebody else is coming instead? Will that person be known to the person with dementia? Ask whether care workers have to work within strict time constraints, especially where visits are quite short, or do they have any flexibility to stay a little longer, if necessary?

Good quality care providers will focus on relationships and have an emphasis on person-centred care. Where dementia is concerned, this approach means that all staff will focus on the person as an individual, rather than the condition itself. Although it sounds simple, it means that they will be treated as the person they are, not as a person with dementia.
Staff should engage in conversation with them and get to know their interests, likes and dislikes, even if they cannot communicate their wishes. Staff should also try to accommodate your loved one’s daily routines. They should be interested in, and try to learn about, their past and what their life has been like, their childhood, their career, their family etc. This is where the life story record can help.

Ask any care provider if staff have specialist dementia qualifications. Alzheimer’s Society, for example, offers a Foundation Certificate in Dementia Awareness. The test is available on its website and it tests care staff on their knowledge of dementia and how people can be supported in a person-centred way.

Care providers and their staff will undertake specific training on aspects of supporting people who receive care and support. Dementia training can be one aspect of this and many training organisations offer this type of course. A good care provider will undertake training in supporting people with dementia and will be able to prove, and be proud of, that fact. Some care providers have developed their own dementia care training, which is accredited, and are likely to have a specific member of staff to take the lead on caring for people with dementia.

All of these aspects point towards a care provider having a true understanding of how to support someone with dementia. However, choosing a care provider is a very personal decision. It includes so much more than these pointers. If you find a good home, or provider, that takes the time to understand the person with dementia, to see them as an individual and provide the very best relationship-centred support, that you feel comfortable and confident with, then follow your gut instinct. If you have the opportunity, trial periods are a good way to see how the person with dementia will feel with the service and you can always change your mind or look for another home or provider if it doesn’t work.

When it comes to care homes or care homes with nursing, there are no specific dementia care homes. Care homes and care homes with nursing are regulated by the Care Quality Commission and all are able to say that they support people with dementia. However, there are ways that care homes and care homes with nursing can demonstrate that they focus on dementia care, have training in supporting people with dementia and make their home dementia-friendly.

The physical appearance of a care home may be an important factor in which home you choose. You might want to consider somewhere that has a homely look, rather than a hotel-style or vice versa. It’s important to remember that this is where the person with dementia will be living, and they need to feel comfortable in their surroundings as it will be their home.

Some newer, purpose-built homes have circular corridors or gardens that the people can explore on their own. Some homes have cabinets outside of each person’s room, containing an individual’s personal items enabling them to recognise their room. Some homes have rummage boxes filled with items to look through, some may be period items, these can be useful for reminiscing.

When looking at a care home, it’s important to consider what activities are provided. Meaningful activity on a daily basis can really help people to engage and have a good quality of life.

I wish I’d used residential care two years sooner, but that’s said with hindsight, because at the time the right care home didn’t exist.

My mother-in-law, who had dementia, spent the last 9 months of her life in a nursing home. The staff, especially the matron in charge and the GP were very supportive. They took time to talk to us and my mother-in-law and tried hard to take her individual needs and wishes into account.
A good care home or care home with nursing will support people to make their own decisions on a daily basis. This may be as simple as choosing what they’d like to eat or wear that day or helping to perform day-to-day tasks, like laying the table, folding the washing or gardening. This is relationship-centred care with person-centred outcomes – these simple approaches to daily living can help the person with dementia to have control over their life.

There should also be group activities that people can choose to be involved in, from tea dances to exercise. The options are endless and should be developed with the people living there in mind. The National Activity Providers Association (NAPA) supports care teams to enable people to live the life they choose. A project called My Home Life also promotes quality of life and delivers positive change in care homes for older people. Ask any care home you visit if it has heard of NAPA or My Home Life and uses their resources.

Most people want to be fully involved in their loved one’s life if they move into a care home. A good home will ensure that the carer and close family are involved as much as possible in the person with dementia’s care. If you feel that the home is not involving you as much as you would like, speak to the manager, they should value your input and knowledge of the person with dementia, and should see you as a partner in their care and support.

For more on identifying a care home that has specialist training in caring for people with dementia, visit www.carechoices.co.uk which has a wealth of information and the facility to search for care provision in your given area.

SUPPORTING SOMEONE WITH DEMENTIA IN A CARE HOME

By now, probably all the best dementia care providers rightly emphasise the importance of knowing the person and their life story.

When we deliver dementia training to our team members, we often talk about becoming ‘dementia detectives’, learning to piece together the phrases, signals and behaviour of residents and relate them to important life events and relationships for each individual.

An ability to read these signals and understand the indicators of wellbeing and tension make it easier for care staff to promote a positive frame of mind and help residents move to a better place if they are distressed. We believe that the person living with dementia is the expert and we need to take our lead from that person.

Equally important to us though, are all the things we don’t know and the appreciation that residents continue to have an emotional life in the present. We believe it is just as important to ‘take people as we find them’ and not focus exclusively on the past.

Much of caring is simply about relating to people ‘person to person’ and reaching out to them in the here and now – a smile, affection and good humour all help to ensure quality of life today and tomorrow. We often describe it as ‘a long goodbye, with lots and lots of hellos.’

Similarly, activities that ‘go with the flow’ are often the most successful – listening to music, dancing, singing or sharing in simple games.

As many people have observed, it’s often easier for people who haven’t known the person with dementia in the past to relate to them today and to ‘step into their world’. Our advice to family members and friends is to get to know your new mum or dad and celebrate the wonder of who the person is today.

HOSPITAL ADMISSIONS

Hospital visits, planned or unplanned, can be unsettling for a person with dementia. However, if the person with dementia needs treatment in a hospital, there are important things you can do to help make the visit less stressful for you both.

Bear in mind that a hospital stay may cause confusion and disorientation. It is a new environment that is unfamiliar. The person with dementia may not know where they are or be able to comprehend why they are there. They may also suggest that they don’t need to be there at all. This might be upsetting, but at these times it’s particularly important to make sure that the staff are fully informed. Ensuring that staff are aware that your relative is living with dementia is vital. The staff will not necessarily know of this and may not be specially trained to care for people who are living with the condition. As such, you may need to stay close by to ensure your loved one’s needs and wishes are communicated and they feel comfortable and safe.

If the hospital visit is planned, find out whether the hospital has a dementia champion who you can speak to about supporting the person with dementia. If there is no dementia champion at the hospital, you can arrange to meet with the named nurse. He or she should be able to answer any questions you have and work with you to make sure that the person with dementia is well cared for.

On any visit to the hospital, ensure you fully inform them of your loved one’s dementia and if you have put together a life story record, take this with you or use Alzheimer’s Society’s This is me document. If you have pulled out the important issues and have any medical information in there such as advance decisions and specific health and care considerations take a copy of that along too. This can be kept in their patient file so that anyone who may treat your relative can see it. These documents can be a useful tool for medical staff, who may find it easier to communicate with the person with dementia if they have some background information on their life.

Even if the person you care for has been taken to hospital in an emergency situation, and you have been unable to plan for it, there is plenty you can do. During both planned and unplanned visits, the hospital staff will appreciate any information that you can give them. As the carer of the person with dementia, you are in a position to know what might make them upset. You may also be able to let the nurses know what they can do to help if the person becomes anxious.

You may want to offer to help at mealtimes if your relative needs assistance. Hospital staff may find this useful as mealtimes are often a busy time for them and they may not have the resources readily available to help people who are living with dementia. Try to help keep them hydrated too as some symptoms of dehydration can mimic dementia.

When someone is in hospital, if you (or a friend or relative) are able to visit regularly, it may help to bring comfort to the person with dementia. You will also be able to understand how they are getting on and offer any additional support they may need. It can be a difficult time for all and you may notice a deterioration in their condition. You may also want to push for flexible visiting times, to enable you to stay with the person with dementia to support them should they not settle.

John’s Campaign fights for the right to stay with people with dementia in hospital. The campaign calls for the families and carers of people with dementia to have the same rights as the parents of sick children and be allowed to remain with them in hospital for as many hours as they are needed, and as they are able to give.

John’s Campaign has advice for carers if the person they support goes into hospital. It says that as a carer, you should insist that you need to be there for the person with dementia and explain why. Be clear. A carer is different from a visitor. Quite a number of hospitals have policies of allowing carer access outside visiting hours, but it’s not always highlighted. Also, identify yourself as a carer, as well as the person’s child, spouse, companion or best friend. There is often a policy that will cover carers. Be clear that you are there to provide that totally essential nurture and connection back to the outside world. If you’re able and willing to be there, don’t let yourself be turned away.

The campaign’s website www.johnscampaign.org.uk has a list of participating hospitals.

FORMAL CARE OUT OF HOSPITAL

The person with dementia may require formal care services upon discharge from hospital, or existing services may need to be changed or reinstated when the person is ready to be discharged from hospital. You may find the person with dementia is required to stay in hospital for longer than anticipated if services are required and are not in place. You may wish to consider alternative accommodation if returning home is not the right thing for the person with dementia.

You should speak to the hospital discharge team to get an assessment of your relative’s needs to assist in getting the relevant support in place as quickly as you can. This is likely to include a number of different professionals including social services staff, occupational therapists and medical specialists. It should result in a care plan being put in place and services being arranged. If the person with dementia is not in need of formal care services, they may be discharged back home and require a few weeks of support to enable them to get back on their feet. Speak to the hospital or any social worker about the options available, this may be called reablement or intermediate care.

Care Choices, the publisher of this Guide, has a number of other information sources to help with care and support decisions. The Care Choices website has more information on arranging care and support. It covers all aspects of the process in more detail than we can cover here.

Care Choices also publishes regional care and support directories and has comprehensive listings of all care providers in its publications and on its website. These resources enable you to look for care and support providers based on specific requirements. Using the website will result in a tailor-made list of care services matching individual needs and preferences in your chosen locality. Visit www.carechoices.co.uk

Formal care and support can play a huge part in the life of a person with dementia and their family. By understanding their needs and enlisting the most appropriate service, people can be supported to live well with dementia in whatever setting is most appropriate for them.
Planning for end of life

Talking about end of life can be difficult. It isn’t always easy to face the thought that a loved one will pass away and broaching the subject can be painful. However, openness and positive planning can help everyone prepare and bring comfort as the dementia symptoms progress. This can be achieved by discussing, sharing and understanding the wishes of the person with dementia.

Dementia is a progressive condition which, unfortunately, doesn’t have a cure. It is classed as a terminal illness, which people may not realise or want to accept. Early diagnosis, followed by honest conversations and careful planning, are essential. Although they may not be the easiest of conversations, ultimately, it should help the person with dementia to feel confident that their preferences and concerns around death are known and will be acted upon when the time comes. It can help to reduce anxiety and also give any family carers the confidence to make important decisions when needed, because you have all openly discussed the wishes of the person with dementia.

DISCUSSING END OF LIFE PLANS

People deal with end of life considerations in different ways and there’s no right or wrong approach. When someone has a dementia diagnosis, they may immediately wish to get their affairs in order and make plans for their will and estate. Or they may not want to address these matters straight away. Everyone is different. However, it is important not to leave it too late to have conversations about life and death. Dementia can take away the ability to communicate, so talking sooner rather than later will help everyone.

Whenever you, the person with dementia and any close family members start to get plans in place, it’s important that conversations include end of life considerations. These can be difficult and some people, the person with dementia, you, other members of the family or close friends may not want to talk about them. However, as mentioned above, when someone has dementia, it is important to broach these subjects while they are able to share their wishes. They should be at the centre of all conversations and you should consider that plans may change and evolve over time.

It has been said that what we fear most about dying is the associated loss of control. By the person with dementia expressing their wishes for care and support, as the condition progresses towards the end of their life, control can be restored. People should be supported not only to live well with dementia, but to die well too. You must all be supported with accurate information to help the planning process. Alzheimer’s Society has factsheets on end of life care when someone has dementia.

Try to choose the right place and the right time to start having conversations. It may be that the person with dementia raises the subject, or you may feel the need to instigate initial conversations. Avoid stressful situations and be sensitive to the person with dementia’s desire to talk about their future. There’s no right or wrong way to address the topic of dying and end of life, but here are a few sensitive suggestions.

- Find a sensitive time to raise the subject.
- Start with a question such as, ‘Do you think we should talk about...?’ ‘Have you thought about...?’
- Alternatively, start with something direct but reassuring, ‘I know this isn’t easy to talk about...’ or ‘We’ve never talked about this before but...’
- Sometimes people prefer to set out what they don’t want such as stating that they wouldn’t like to die in hospital. This can open the door to a wider conversation.
- Encourage everyone involved to be totally honest about how they feel from the start. If you’re all open, there may be both laughter and tears – don’t be afraid of either.
- If the person with dementia is worried about talking about death with those they love, suggest they perhaps talk to someone else like a GP, nurse or friend.
- Don’t be so worried about saying the wrong thing that you don’t say anything.

ADVANCE CARE PLANNING

During the planning process, the person with dementia may wish to make an advance care plan. This will set out their wishes for their future care, including where they would like to be cared for, any treatment they may, or may not, wish to receive, where they would like to die and if they wish to be resuscitated.

An advance care plan is a discussion between the person with dementia, their family (if they wish) and anyone providing them with care and support. A document can be drafted to be kept by those supporting the person with dementia, health or social care professionals, family members plus any appointed attorney.
PLANNING FOR END OF LIFE

(For more information on powers of attorney see page 60). During this process, it is possible to go on to make specific legal arrangements such as an advance decision.

An advance decision may also be called a living will and enables people to refuse specific types of treatment in the future. This is particularly useful if the person with dementia is no longer able to communicate their wishes. All treatments they would like to refuse, and any specific circumstances, must be detailed in the document. The document can be legally binding, so it is important to make sure it sets out the person’s wishes, is signed by them and a witness. Speak to a health professional about an advance decision.

The person with dementia must have the mental capacity to make the advance decisions so, as with all aspects of planning, it is better to make these decisions sooner rather than later. For information on mental capacity, see page 59.

APPROACHING THE END OF LIFE

As the symptoms of dementia progress, the person with dementia may develop other conditions – see page 34 for more information on health conditions associated with dementia. It’s important to be prepared for this.

It is also important to be aware of pre-bereavement, as well as bereavement. Many people grieve together before someone dies and support can help them to deal with this. It is common to experience feelings of bereavement and grief throughout the whole process. If you need help or advice, there are a number of support networks.

You might be offered an Admiral Nurse or a Marie Curie nurse to support you and the person with dementia towards the end of their life. Admiral Nurses are specialist dementia nurses that offer practical and emotional support – not just at the end of life. They can support the person with dementia, you and your wider family. Admiral Nurses are covered in more detail on page 42.

Wherever the person with dementia is being cared for, in their own home, a care home, hospice or hospital, you should be confident that the people caring for them have the necessary training to help make their end of life as comfortable as possible. A good understanding of someone’s wishes can help to ensure this happens, as well as to avoid unnecessary hospital admission. Most people would prefer not to die in a hospital and with good planning, everyone involved in the person’s care should help to ensure this happens.

Any health and care staff should assess the person with dementia as their needs and symptoms progress. They should also be familiar with the person’s specific wishes. Talking about these things whilst the person with dementia still has the capacity can help to ensure this happens.

Health, care and support providers should have their own end of life care policies, ask any professionals about their policy and training on the subject. End of life should be a sympathetic time and care staff, whilst being professional, will also be sympathetic and understanding of the situation and the emotions surrounding it.

You might be offered an Admiral Nurse or a Marie Curie nurse to support you and the person with dementia towards the end of their life. Admiral Nurses are specialist dementia nurses that offer practical and emotional support – not just at the end of life. They can support the person with dementia, you and your wider family. Admiral Nurses are covered in more detail on page 42.

Marie Curie nurses make it possible for people to die at home, comfortably, with their wishes followed and surrounded by their close family and friends. Your GP or district nurse are key to getting a Marie Curie nurse so speak to them directly.

Look at the local services starting on page 65 and the useful national contacts on page 74.
PALLIATIVE CARE

Palliative care focuses on the relief of pain and other symptoms experienced in serious illness. The aim is to improve quality of life, by increasing comfort, promoting dignity and providing a support system to the person with dementia and those close to them.

People with dementia often live for many years after their diagnosis, but it is recommended to make palliative care plans long before entering the end of life phase. Palliative care neither hastens nor prolongs death. It makes the most of life, even when time is limited. It regards dying as a normal process. Palliative care can be delivered in any setting, including at home, care homes, hospitals and hospices. Hospices provide palliative care services at home, in day care centres or hospice inpatient units. Most people who have inpatient hospice care return home once their needs for care support are addressed.

I wish I’d known about palliative care and what it could offer to my mother and myself. If I had, I would have been a stronger advocate for it.

DYING WITH DIGNITY

Wherever the person with dementia chooses to die, it is of utmost importance that they are treated with compassion, dignity, respect, comfort and support. Even when they are unable to communicate their wishes. As mentioned above, talking about and planning for end of life can help you to ensure that you fully understand their wishes. It may enable them to have the best quality of life possible right up until the end. The death of a loved one is not easy to deal with, however being safe in the knowledge they are comfortable, cared for and at peace, will bring you comfort.

Ensuring the person with dementia has a good quality of life is important. What makes their quality of life good will be specific to them. However, it is likely to include ensuring they are pain-free and comfortable and that any social, medical, emotional or spiritual needs are respected. They may want to be surrounded by their own possessions, family, pets or familiar music. They may want to be able to see outside, hear the birds or have the radio on. People of faith may want to be visited by their local faith leader. This will be very personal to them and reiterates the importance of planning and understanding what they like, what makes them happy or brings them comfort plus their specific end of life wishes.

However, consider that people’s needs and wishes may change towards the end of their life. If this happens, the person with dementia may not want the things they had discussed when planning their end of life care. Consider their needs regularly and if it is clear that something they have requested distresses them, or if their needs change to the point that you cannot follow their wishes, it is ok to shift from the plans, if needed.

THE IMPORTANCE OF GOOD CARE IN END OF LIFE

A care home moved Christmas forward two months for a male resident who loved that time of year and was on an end of life pathway. They decorated his room with tinsel and Christmas lights, dressed up in Christmas jumpers, sang Christmas carols, brought in reindeer to see him, gathered his family and took lots of pictures. He passed away two days later, but he got his wish to see Christmas. His family and the home also have many happy memories of his final few days.

With thanks to an Admiral Nurse at The Orders of St John Care Trust.

FUNERAL PLANNING

Whilst planning for the future, many people consider writing down their wishes for their funeral. This can help to alleviate pressures on the wider family. You may appreciate knowing your loved one’s wishes and that you can make sure these are considered at their funeral. By detailing their wishes, it can bring comfort to know that you don’t need to make all the decisions about the service and know that you are making the right choices. Things to consider are included in My Funeral Wishes, a form produced by Dying Matters and the National Association of Funeral Directors. Visit www.dyingmatters.org/page/my-funeral-wishes

OTHER CONSIDERATIONS

Beyond the subjects mentioned above, there are other considerations that you and your loved one may like to discuss.

• Have either of you considered how funeral costs would be met?
• Are they a registered organ donor?
• Would they want to leave their brain or body to medical research, e.g. to help with dementia research?
• How would they like to be remembered?
• What would they like people to know before they die?

PRACTICAL HELP

There is a range of organisations that can help you plan the support and care the person with dementia needs towards the end of life, including advising on writing wills and advance decisions and providing advice on the emotional issues surrounding dying. The Dying Matters and NHS Choices websites are useful starting points.

You can also find information about a range of practical services to support people approaching the end of life, their family and their carers on the Dying Matters website.

Life after caring can also seem daunting. If your future has been put on hold whilst you care for someone with dementia, you may feel uncertain about where you go from here. There are lots of resources available to support you as you adjust to your new situation and it can help to talk openly.

Many people grieve while the person is still alive but bear in mind that the grieving process can come out in many ways. Also, consider that different people deal with death and dying differently, and just because someone isn’t grieving in the same way as you, doesn’t mean they’re not grieving. Counselling and support can be very useful when dealing with the prospect of someone dying. This doesn’t have to be towards the end of their life, it can be at diagnosis, after they have passed away or at any stage in-between.
Legal and financial affairs

A running theme through this guide is one of planning; helping the person with dementia to plan their wishes, set out their life history and make a plan for legal and financial considerations before their capacity to do so changes.

You can’t expect the person with dementia to be logical and rational.

In an ideal world, the person with dementia received an early diagnosis. In these circumstances plans can be made, involving family and professionals in the discussions. The best approach is considered to be to plan together while you still can, wherever possible enabling the person with dementia to lead the discussions. However, it is quite likely that you’ll be coming to this planning process once symptoms have progressed. Even so, there are mechanisms in place to help the person with dementia to make decisions or to support you to make the right decisions in their best interests. These may be in relation to managing finances, property and welfare.

WHAT IS MENTAL CAPACITY?

Mental capacity is about having the ability to make decisions. This includes being able to understand the decision that needs to be made, and its implications, when it needs to be made.
According to the Mental Health Foundation, for someone to ‘lack capacity’ – because of an illness or disability such as dementia – they cannot do one or more of the following four things:

- Understand information given to them about a particular decision.
- Retain that information long enough to be able to make the decision.
- Weigh up the information available to make the decision.
- Communicate their decision.

As the dementia symptoms progress, they can affect a person’s ability to make certain decisions, although they may have periods when they are able to understand the situation and make the relevant decision.

The Mental Capacity Act 2005 protects people in England and Wales who may lack the capacity to make one or more decisions when the decision needs to be made. One of its main principles is that a person must be assumed to have capacity unless it is established that he/she lacks capacity. Whether someone has capacity is considered on a decision-by-decision basis. For instance, they may lack the capacity to make a decision about travel or selling their home but will be able to decide what they would like for lunch or where, ideally, they would prefer to live. Speak to a professional about the Mental Capacity Act and ensure it is followed if the person with dementia needs to make specific decisions as their symptoms progress.

WHAT HAPPENS IF SOMEONE LACKS CAPACITY?

If the person with dementia has assets of their own, such as property or bank accounts, you may find that as their symptoms progress they will increasingly need assistance with managing their financial affairs. There is no automatic right for someone, even a spouse, to take over managing the finances of another person. The situation can become complicated if the right safeguards aren’t in place. Before someone’s capacity to make these decisions changes, you and the person living with dementia should consider setting up a power of attorney.

A power of attorney is a document that enables someone to appoint ‘attorneys’, a trusted friend and/or relative, to manage their financial affairs. This can be if they no longer wish to manage them themselves or if they become incapable of doing so, for example, as the dementia symptoms progress. Usually, at least two people are appointed to act as attorneys and a professional adviser, such as a solicitor, can also act as an attorney.

Pre-2007, someone may have had an Enduring Power of Attorney – this will still be valid if prepared before October 2007. However, if prepared after that time, the document is known as a Lasting Power of Attorney. There are two types, one dealing with welfare decisions and the other dealing with finances. It is not necessary to have both documents, but it is worth considering whether to empower an attorney to act in best interests with regard to decisions about finances.

Powers of attorney must be registered with the Office of the Public Guardian before they can be used.

In a Lasting Power of Attorney, the person with dementia can set out their plans for managing their affairs. If there is more than one attorney appointed, they can decide whether the attorneys can act together, or independently of each other. They can also place restrictions on what attorneys can and can’t deal with, should they wish. If they set no restrictions, then the attorney has the power to access all of the person’s financial affairs, including being able to buy and sell any property on their behalf, as long as they are acting in the person’s best interests.

If granted attorneyship in relation to health matters, then similarly this person will be able to access the person with dementia’s health records and be involved in decision-making with professionals involved in managing their care. By appointing an attorney, the person with dementia is essentially placing their life in the hands of one or more people, enabling them to help make decisions for them. This is why attorneys should be someone the person with dementia trusts and believes will act in their best interests at all times.

WHEN IS IT TOO LATE TO GET A POWER OF ATTORNEY?

It is important that the person with dementia prepares their power of attorney when they still have the capacity to do so. However advanced a person’s dementia symptoms may be, they may still have periods when they can understand the power of attorney. As long as they are able to communicate their understanding, someone may be able to sign on their behalf. It is important to get legal advice on these matters though to ensure the power of attorney is completed in the best interests of the person with dementia and is legally binding.

In cases where someone’s dementia symptoms have progressed to the stage that they are unable to complete a Lasting Power of Attorney, you can apply to the Court of Protection to appoint a deputy.

WHAT IS A DEPUTY?

A deputy can be anyone over the age of 18, including relatives or friends. They have a similar role to that of an attorney and, by way of a court order, they are able to manage the financial affairs of the person with dementia.

To be appointed a deputy, the person needs to submit an application to the Court of Protection setting out their suitability for the role and information about the person with dementia’s financial circumstances. This application will go to a judge who will consider whether the person with dementia lacks capacity to manage their own affairs and, if so, whether it is in their best interests for the applicant to be appointed their deputy.

MAKING A WILL

If you are the partner or spouse of the person with dementia, you may know if they have made a will, however, that’s not always the case. A will is a confidential document setting out someone’s wishes around what happens to their money, property and possessions after they die. If someone dies without a will, the law sets out who gets what.

Making a will doesn’t have to be an expensive process and the Government website www.gov.uk/make-will has lots of information. People can write their wills themselves, however, it is a legal document, so it is important to seek specialist legal advice.

If the person with dementia wishes to make a new will, or there is no trace of them having a will, you need to find out whether they have ‘testamentary capacity’ to make a new one.

If there are concerns that the person with dementia lacks capacity to make a new will, a GP can be asked to assess this. If medical opinion is that the person lacks testamentary capacity, then an application can be made to the Court of Protection for a ‘statutory will’. The person making the application does not need to be the deputy or attorney of the person with dementia.

A statutory will is essentially a will that is prepared on behalf of the person with dementia with terms that are believed to be in their best interests. The Court of Protection then considers the will and the wishes and feelings of those people who would otherwise inherit and decides whether to approve the will. This process can be very complex and it is advisable to seek advice from a specialist solicitor to make this type of application in all cases. In many cases, it will be better for all concerned than allowing the person with dementia to die without a will in place.

FURTHER INFORMATION

These are only some of the legal and financial considerations when a person has dementia. There are other considerations if they require formal care or support and how this may be paid for. The Care Choices website, produced by the publisher of this Guide, has more information on finding care and support and associated considerations. Alternatively, Care Choices publishes a range of care and support guides for different regions, visit www.carechoices.co.uk to see if your region is covered, find out more or to search for care providers in your area.

Dementia Action Alliances

HAMPshire Dementia Action Alliance

The Hampshire Dementia Action Alliance (HDAA) is a group of local organisations that are passionate about equality for people living with dementia within the county.

Dementia Friendly Hampshire is a small charity which acts as Secretariat to HDAA and supports the work of creating dementia friendly communities, businesses and organisations across Hampshire.

Our aim is for people with dementia and their carers to live well and to be part of their communities. We work to increase understanding and awareness of dementia to reduce stigma and to improve the lives of those affected. The hope is that people with dementia and their families and loved ones can feel better supported in their communities.

This will be achieved by:
• Supporting and helping to set up local Dementia Action Groups.

• Encouraging organisations to become Dementia Friendly and to join the Hampshire Dementia Action Alliance.

• Being involved in innovative and exciting projects and partnerships.

• Signposting people to advice and information on dementia.

• Promoting dementia awareness.

One of our priorities is to create opportunities for people affected by dementia to continue to live their lives. For example, it is important that people with dementia stay active for as long as possible and that they and their carers retain their social networks and emotional wellbeing. This might involve participating in their favourite activities where possible and trying new ones where it is not. We work with partners to provide accessible sports sessions, dancing and gardening; for example, we have teamed up with Healthy Walks Hampshire to provide dementia accessible walks. The first walk will be launched in October 2018 as part of the New Forest Walking Festival. We are always looking for new ways to provide accessible activities, so please challenge us to organise sessions for your favourite hobby.

In addition to our work raising awareness, supporting local Dementia Action Groups and recruiting businesses and organisations to the HDAA, we partner with Hampshire Cricket providing Memory Days where people living with dementia are supported to watch matches at the Ageas Bowl.

Furthermore, we have partnered with Wessex Academic Health Science Network to start making GP practices more dementia friendly. We also co-chaired the Hampshire Young Onset Dementia Steering Group with Emma Borley, a Southampton Admiral Nurse.

Most importantly, we provide information, advice and support to tailor our help to suit your needs.

Local Dementia Action Groups are organisations run by volunteers who want to make the county Dementia Friendly. Examples of their activities include:

• DemFest, a family festival based in Romsey designed to inspire, inform and educate.

• Reminiscence in the Park at Royal Victoria Country Park; inspired by the success of DemFest and organised by Bursledon, Hamble and Hound Dementia Action Group.

• Installing unique information points in GP surgeries and supermarkets.

• Dementia Friendly cinema screenings.

All groups encourage dementia awareness by organising Dementia Friends sessions. In addition, each group works with local businesses and organisations to sign them up to the Hampshire Dementia Action Alliance. This paints a positive picture for the future of Hampshire as a Dementia Friendly county.
PORTSMOUTH DEMENTIA ACTION ALLIANCE

The Portsmouth Dementia Action Alliance (PDAA) is run by Remind, Portsmouth’s local dementia service. Remind is delivered in partnership by Solent Mind, SCA Group and Rowans Hospice, working together to support people living with dementia and their carers.

We believe that people with a dementia diagnosis can live well and be part of their communities.

We are working with local businesses and services to encourage the people of Portsmouth to have a better understanding and awareness of dementia:

• We provide free Dementia Friends training sessions to local services, creating more awareness of the needs of people with dementia and how to make shop environments more welcoming.
• We are working to attain Dementia Friendly status for Portsmouth by inviting organisations to join the Dementia Action Alliance.
• We share information and updates about the work that is taking place in Portsmouth to bring together a society-wide response to dementia.

Portsmouth Dementia Action Alliance’s vision is for information and advice regarding memory issues and dementia to be easily accessible to all. We believe that working towards a Dementia Friendly status for Portsmouth will help our vision to be realised.

SOUTHAMPTON DEMENTIA ACTION ALLIANCE

Southampton Dementia Action Alliance (SDAA) is run by Alzheimer’s Society and consists of professionals and individuals who are passionate about making the city of Southampton a more dementia friendly place to live and visit.

Southampton City Council and Southampton City Clinical Commissioning Group (health) fund SDAA to ensure that we can achieve our aims and action plan, as well as continue to provide support to existing and newly-emerging Dementia Friendly Communities.

We provide information, advice, guidance and support and we will tailor our help to suit your needs and we will make sure you have all the support and information you need. Our aims include:

• Raising awareness of dementia and reducing associated stigmas across the city.
• Supporting businesses and organisations city-wide to become more dementia friendly.
• Helping to create and support Dementia Friendly Communities in different areas of Southampton.
• Contributing towards making Southampton a
DEMENTIA ACTION ALLIANCES / DEMENTIA SUPPORT IN HAMPSHIRE

recognised Dementia Friendly City.

Our action plan focuses on the following areas of improvement:

- Dementia Friend information sessions to be offered throughout the city to businesses, organisations and community groups.
- Transportation throughout the city to become more dementia friendly. SDAA will aim to contribute towards the Southampton Transport Review that is underway to ensure the needs of people with dementia, and their carers, are considered.
- Exploring opportunities for high-quality information about the dementia journey alongside local information about services, support groups and care pathways being made available to people living with dementia, their families and carers.

Greenbanks Care Home

A FAMILY APPROACH TO CARE

“Moving into care was extremely daunting but the staff at Greenbanks made the transition so much more pleasant and easy than I had anticipated. The care is truly individual and I feel welcome to visit anytime. I have been overwhelmed by the commitment of all the staff.”
Wife of Resident

We spend our lives with our families in family homes and at Kindred Care we believe that’s the best model for a happy, contented life as we grow old and need more care. Sadly, care can often be institutional, in large facilities and hotel-like complexes, which sometimes lack a personal approach to care.

At Kindred Care we create homes with all the warmth, charm and comfort of a family home, where close communities of residents, their families, and staff can thrive. In this intimate, family setting staff are supported to give excellent care, and we get to know each resident well and understand their individual needs.

Aster Care promote the idea that people with dementia still have something to offer the community.

Living with dementia can be a very frightening experience. Whilst many people can live well with dementia, others may wander or lose their road safety awareness.

Aster Care can provide 24-hour care to those most at risk with an excellent track record of keeping people safe at home, and in the community.

Here is a summary of the complete service that we can provide where dementia may exist alongside a long-term condition:

- Providing at-home, alternative solutions to nursing home care for those with long-term health care conditions who cannot be left alone for long-term medical, social or other reasons.
- Longer visits of care such as day or night shifts, or continuous 24-hour care at home.
- Providing designated health care tasks such as PEG feeding, tracheostomy care, non-invasive ventilation (CIPAP, BiPAP), complex medication administration where required.
- Specialist dementia support for those with Frontotemporal Dementia (FTD), Lewy Body Dementia, and other types where a community DoLS order may be required.

Scottish and Southern Electricity Networks operates the electricity network which brings power to your home.

We recognise that some of our customers may need extra support during a power cut.

Our free Priority Services Register offers:
- A dedicated 24 hour priority services phone number
- Priority updates during a power cut
- A range of adapted services and extra help if required

Barker Son & Isherwood Solicitors has its own team of dedicated professionals, who are well versed across many aspects of later life planning and care, including the preparation and registration of Powers of Attorney, advising clients on care funding applications, assisting individuals acting as a court-appointed Deputy, and the preparation of Wills.

Our private client team is overseen by Zoë McManus, who is a registered Trusts and Estates Practitioner, and a member of the Solicitors for the Elderly organisation. Zoe joined Barker Son & Isherwood in 2017 and brings with her a wealth of experience and practical knowledge to assist individuals at any stage of later life planning.

Barker Son & Isherwood are dedicated to helping everybody make coherent and robust decisions about their future, by providing clear constructive advice on the preparation of Powers of Attorney for both Property and Financial affairs, as well as Health and Welfare matters.

Where an individual may have lost the ability to make a Lasting Power of Attorney, we offer practical and forward-thinking advice to the families and friends of the individual, and assist them in applying to the Court of Protection for a Deputyship Order. We frequently act as a Professional Deputy in cases where friends and family members aren’t able to provide the help their loved one needs.

Barker Son & Isherwood can advise on healthcare funding matters, for both new and existing clients, to ensure that their client’s financial affairs are properly protected and more importantly to provide peace of mind to the client, their family, and close friends.

As a firm, we also help our clients effectively plan to provide for their family and friends after death, so our clients can rest easy knowing that their loved ones will be properly taken care of.

Please feel free to contact one of our team for an initial discussion to see how we can help you.
